"Mr. Davis has given us detailed and careful descriptions of the extant remains on the ancient sites which he visited. . . . But the chief interest of his book will be found rather in the picture he gives us of the existing state of the countries which he traversed than in his contributions to our archæological knowledge."—Acad., vii. 2.

2. Life in Asiatic Turkey: a Journal of Travel in Cilicia, (Pedias and Trachæa,) Isauria, and Parts of Lycaonia and Cappadocia. Maps and Illust. Lon., 1879, 8vo.

"He visited places which are scarcely known to modern travellers. . . . He has seen so much that he might easily have written a most interesting book. He has told so much that he has run the risk of spoiling the interest of his book. . . . Any one who conscientiously reads his book without skipping, or with very little skipping, . . . gets impressed on his mind a very distinct picture of the wonderfully varied scenery of the interesting country through which he travelled, and of the habits of its much-suffering population."—*Sat. "The book Mr. Davis has written is not the book which real students of history would have asked him to write. They would like to have him tell the things which he knows better than other men, and of which his personal reminiscences will be original and valuable evidence. . . . Mr. Davis in his two bulky volumes throws hardly a single ray of light upon the real secrets of the great conflict."—Nation, xxxiii. 10.

"The work of Mr. Jefferson Davis will disappoint some readers and weary others. Those who turn to his volumes for revelations will find that he has little that is new to tell, while those who hope to get from him a concise and clear view of the organization of which he was the soul and the chief will be repelled by the vast amount of dissertation with which he cumbers his pages. . . . His work may not vindicate him from the charge of blundering or folly; it will not raise him in the opinion of his fellow-citizens in the North; but every impartial reader must recognize the ability with which it is composed, the sincerity with which his opinions are held and the good faith with which they are set forth, and the value which it possesses as the authentic commentary on the most momentous episode in the history of the United States."—Ath., No. 2799.

"Mrs. Davis's stories are habitually spoken of as 'earnest' works. . . . Their pretensions are something very different from those of the simple novel of entertainment, of character, and of incident. The writer takes life desperately hard, and looks upon the world with a sentimental—we may even say, a tearful—eye. The other novel—the objective novel, as we may call it for convenience—appeals to the reader's sense of beauty, his idea of form and proportion, his humanity in the broadest sense. Mrs. Davis's tales and those of her school appeal, we may say, to the conscience, to the sense of right and wrong, to the instincts of charity and patronage. She aims at instructing us, purifying us, stirring up our pity. Writers of the other school content themselves with exciting our curiosity."—Nation, vii. 330.

"The work is divided into three parts. The first deals wholly with prison experiences; . . . the second treats of the causes which produce a criminal class, and suggests remedies; . . . and, lastly, there is a section occupied exclusively with Irish political matter,—'How Ireland is Ruled and Ruined,' and 'How the Anglo-Irish Problem might be Solved.' . . . In all three parts, however diverse the subject, the treatment of the matter in hand is thoughtful, temperate, and dignified."—Ath., No. 2985.

Dawkins, William Boyd, F.R.S., F.G.S., b. 1838, at Welshpool, Montgomeryshire, Wales; was educated at Jesus College, Oxford, where he was the first holder of a geological scholarship founded by the Baroness Burdett-Coutts, and graduated 1860. He was appointed geologist to the Geological Survey of Great Britain in 1867, and in 1874 became professor of geology in Owens College, Manchester. In 1882 he was one of the committee of scientific men appointed to inquire into the scheme of the Channel Tunnel, and was intrusted with the geological survey of the French and English coasts. He has contributed numerous papers to the Proceedings of the Geological, Anthropological, and Royal Societies, relating chiefly to fossil mammalia, and is best known by his researches on the remains discovered in caves in the south of France. He visited the United States in 1880, and lectured before the Lowell Institute in Boston. 1. Cave-Hunting: Researches on the Evidences of Caves respecting the Early Inhabitants of Europe. Illustrated by Coloured Plates and Wood-Cuts. Lon., 1874, 8vo.

"Mr. Dawkins divides his subject under two heads, Physical and Biological: the first treating of the relation of caves to general physical geography, especially to that of the calcareous strata; the second, of their animal contents."—Ath., No. 2458.

"No one has gone more thoroughly than Professor Dawkins into the evidence as to the succession of animal life in England since the Miocene period, and the bearing of this evidence on the antiquity of man. . . . He is less disposed than most cave-hunters to worship their special 'idols of the cave.' But when he comes out into the open, and takes to looking ethnologically at the people of the land, he is somewhat apt to set up 'idols of the tribe' and pay them reverence."—Spectator, xlvii. 1568.

2. Early Man in Britain, and his Place in the Tertiary Period. Illust. Lon., 1880, 8vo.

"Professor Boyd Dawkins has sought to bring to a common focus the rays of light shed upon the primæval stage of human life by the sciences of geology, prehistoric archæology, and history. . . . With the materials thus accumulated the archæologist may claim to have established, as our author does in his preliminary remarks, a tolerably complete sequence of events from the remote past in which man stands in the geological foreground down to the borders of written history."—Sat. Rev., xlix. 827.

"The weight of learning in its pages is by no means oppressive, since it is relieved by a pleasant style of writing, not common, it is sad to say, in works on solid science."—Ath., No. 2739.

Dawson, Sir John William, LL.D., F.R.S., F.G.S., C.M.G., b. 1820, at Pictou, Nova Scotia; was educated in the University of Edinburgh, and returning to Nova Scotia devoted himself to the study of its geology and natural history, and accompanied Sir Charles Lyell in his explorations there in 1842 and in 1852. In 1855 he became principal of McGill University, Montreal. In 1882 he received the Lyell medal of the Geological Society for eminent geological discoveries. He was knighted in 1884. In 1885 he presided at the meeting of the British Association at Birmingham. 1. "What Sir Roderick Murchison's well-known labours did a generation back for the Silurian system of Western Britain the careful work of Dr. J. W. Dawson may be said to have done for the geological structure and remains of the maritime Provinces of British North America. . . . Besides its bearing upon theoretical or general geology, the work has a high local and economical value in regard to the mineral and other sources of wealth with which the Acadian soil is essentially rich."—*Sat. "The conclusion arrived at . . . is, that Eozoon was either the first, or nearly the first, of animals; that the skeletons, microscopic though they be, contributed to form the oldest hills of our continents; that they have been sealed up in solid marble; and that they are associated with hard crystalline rocks, contorted in the most fantastic manner."—Ath., No. 2505.

"It is the object of Sir W. Dawson's book to exhibit the culture of the native American as it existed in præ-Columbian days, and by means of it to throw light upon the habits and institutions of Palæolithic man, as he lived in Hoxne or the valleys of the Somme. . . . He lays down as an established starting-point the Hebrew tradition of our first parents, applies to it the Usherian chronology of B.C. 4000, cites Tubal-Cain as the pioneer of the Iron Age, Jubal of the nomadic life, sees in Adam a Turanian man, in the big tenants of the Cro-mageron cave the giants of Genesis. . . . We had thought that the school of Reconcilists was extinct, but, living in a land of survivals, Sir W. Dawson has galvanized it into unexpected life."—Spectator, lix. 1276.

De Forest, John William, [ante, vol. i., add.,] b. 1826, at Humphreysville, (now Seymour,) Conn. Part of his early life was spent abroad, where he became a proficient in modern languages. He served throughout the civil war, commanding a company of Connecticut volunteers, and leaving the army with the brevet rank of major. After the war he remained for a time in the army as adjutant-general of the veteran reserve-corps, and afterwards as chief of a district under the Freedman's Bureau. Since 1868 he has resided chiefly in New Haven. He has contributed a large number of articles to the Atlantic Monthly and other periodicals. 1. "Mr. De Forest has many of the necessary qualifications of a good novelist. His plots are always interesting, and the reader is carried on to the end of the book in a pleasing uncertainty between a profound conviction of a happy issue and alarm at the dangers that encompass the tortured hero and heroine. His characters are sharply and humorously drawn, and, if they often lack those higher qualities that make people interesting in stories and in real life, they have certainly the merit of distinctness. They make an impression as of people whom we have seen. They stand out well. The scenes, too, that he represents are put before us with considerable dramatic vigor. His style is never dull, and the little side-remarks . . . are often quite amusing."—Nation, xiv. 189.

"The author was a native of Queen's County, connected with the aristocracy of the colony, and one of the judges of the supreme court of the province just before and during the war. . . . Coming as an heirloom into the possession of the late Bishop De Lancey, the manuscript was left by him to his son, under whose conscientious care it is now edited. . . . Our author's simple rule disregards lineage; his censure is all for liberals, his praise all for tories; nor does station silence his reviling, nor sex check his insinuations. . . . The pains and research bestowed upon the notes, making them far the most interesting part of the publication, deserve hearty praise."—Nation, xxviii. 420.

2. John Ward, Preacher, Bost., 1888, 12mo.

"In 'John Ward, Preacher,' the author has given a picture of that rara avis, a logical Calvinist. . . . John Ward's concerns, however, are not the only, perhaps not the main, interest of the book. The village of Ashurst supplies some charming scenes of country life, drawn with the tender grace and quaintness in which the poet of 'The Old Garden' dipped an earlier pen. . . . About the village spinsters and the elderly village bachelor, and the loves and rivalries and incompleted lives of Ashurst, hangs an old-time fragrance, as of a grandmother's rose-jar; but only a modern novelist (or a Greek poet) could have stated and left unsolved so many questions touching on tragedy."—Nation, xlvi. 530.

"There is a wonderful harmony in the book. The tide of Carnival flows ceaselessly through it, with the booming music, the swift, fantastic, whirling rush, of the opening chapter. Images press, associations swarm, sounds are tumultuous, there are dash and glitter everywhere, and one is fairly smothered in flowers and synonymes, bewildered by the strange mixture of good and bad taste, of keen delicate definition of beauty and vulgar daubing, the piling-up of epithets, the attractiveness of some and the repulsiveness of other sentiments, the inveterately false art which first describes a beautiful object beautifully and then spoils the effect by likening it to something else."—Spectator, xlvi. 409.

"Not only does the interest of the tale never flag, but there is scarcely a page which does not contain either some fine bit of description of animate or inanimate nature, some clever touch which shows how thoroughly she understands Italian men and women of the class she has undertaken to portray, or some scrap of prose poetry in a reminiscence of times gone by, or a peep into the art-world of the present day."—Spectator, xlviii. 1067.

"Ouida's new story is perhaps the best of her many and meritorious works. It is in one volume, which is much, and the style is comparatively subdued. . . . The virtue of her amazingly virtuous peasants is kept in the background, her scenery is less lush, less overgrown with violets, maidenhair, rhododendrons, and so on, than usual, and, in short, her style is decidedly chastened. Unfortunately, her theme is not so very chaste."—A. Lang: Acad., ix. 428.

"The book now to be considered makes her genius apparent in the powerful and pathetic story which she tells of an Italian girl, possessed of great beauty and a strength that is marvellous, who takes up her abode alone in an old Etruscan tomb, on a wild moorland; here she subsists almost entirely upon roots, berries, and bread which she makes for herself out of wild oats, exists in a Robinson-Crusoe-like sort of fashion, and has strange adventures. Her character, way of life, and herculean strength appear all pretty equally improbable; but the reader is too much interested to take exception to that, and it no more interferes with his enjoyment than the knowledge of the non-existence of fairies, gnomes, and elves spoils the pleasure of a child deep in some of Hans Andersen's creations."—Spectator, lv. 564.

"Mr. De Morgan's 'paradoxers' are people who propound notions which deviate more or less widely from the accepted notions on any subject. Every one comes across such an inventor occasionally, but few people are aware how very large a class these rational monomaniacs form. It was a happy thought to put them together, and thus enable those who have been puzzled by one or two discoverers to see how they look in the lump. The result is a book of which to say that it is full of the most curious oddities, most amusingly told, is to give a scant description of it. It is one of those rare books in which wit, learning, and scholarship are blended into a charming medley, each page containing a new surprise."—Sat. Rev., xxxiv. 638.

Dempster, Miss Charlotte Louisa Hawkins, b. 1835, at Dunnichen, Forfarshire, Scotland, daughter of James Whitslee Hawkins Dempster. Her parents were cousins, and she was educated by her maternal uncle, George Dempster, of Skibo, whose ancestor of the same name is mentioned ante, vol. i., where also another member of the family, Thomas Dempster, is mentioned. Miss Dempster has been a contributor to the Edinburgh Review since 1861, and has also furnished articles to the North British Review, Blackwood's Magazine, and other periodicals. She has spent much of her time on the Continent, and now resides at Cannes, France. None of her books have her name on the title-page. 1. The Hôtel du Petit St.-Jean: a Gascon Story, Lon., 1869, p. 8vo. Anon. 2d ed., 1870.

"The author is thoroughly at home in the city of Nogent, and has drunk in the spirit of French provincial life to the full."—Sat. Rev., xxix. 21.

2. Véra. By the Author of "The Hôtel du Petit St.-Jean." Lon., 1871, p. 8vo; new ed., 1872. 12mo.

"From an artistic point of view the present story ranks higher than the past; the handling of the plot is superior to the handling of the three or four different threads of plot in 'The Hôtel du Petit St.-Jean.' . . . But the surroundings of this year's book are conventional when compared with the freshness and romance of last year's."—Sat. Rev., xxxi. 215.

3. Essays. By the Author of "Véra" and "The Hôtel du Petit St.-Jean." Lon., 1872, cr. 8vo. (Reprinted, with additions, from the Edinburgh Review, &c. The subjects treated are chiefly French, such as Madame du Plessis-Mornay, French Protestantism, French Anti-Clerical Novels, &c.)

"In this instance . . . the clever novelist is also the clever essayist, although she exhibits her ability with less of evenness and sustainment in the latter capacity."—Spectator, xlv. 442.

"The articles . . . are for the most part respectable, and some of them more than respectable, as such; but they do not display any such originality of thought or special information as to give them permanent literary interest."—Sat. Rev., xxxiii. 575.

"Whether we are to take the story as founded on real incidents, as the introduction leads us to believe, or to treat it as a novel simply, it forms one of the most pathetic variations of the old, old theme that we have read for many a day. It is like an exquisite melody in a minor key."—Spectator, l. 857.

6. Within Sound of the Sea, Lon., 1878, 2 vols. p. 8vo; 2d ed., 1880, 1 vol. 12mo.

"Many readers will like this Scotch story because of its wit and wisdom, others will enjoy its admirable sketches of scenery, and some will ask for it at their libraries because it is the successor to 'Blue Roses,' to which it is, indeed, superior in power and interest. But it will be best appreciated by those who have themselves felt something of that stirring of the sap which has lately expanded northern Calvinism, not less than other Christian communities."—Spectator, lii. 216.

7. The Maritime Alps and their Seaboard. Illust. Lon., 1884, r. 8vo.

"For vivid descriptions of the characteristic aspects and associations of the Provençal landscape we must look elsewhere. The author of 'Véra' is content to give rapid roadside sketches. . . . The best chapters are those that deal with the life on the farms."—Douglas W. Freshfield: Acad., xxvii. 3.

"The authoress herself is mastered by her own learning, and crushes down her facts into mere chronological tables."—Spectator, lviii. 423.

8. Ninette: an Idyll of Provence, Lon., 1888, cr. 8vo. 9. Marjory's Husband, Lon., 1888, p. 8vo.

Legends of the Lintel and the Lay, Lon., 1863, p. 8vo.

"This is one of the books which stir up the wrath of the historian. . . . A fragment of history, however short, with the evidence for it, is something. A genuine local tradition, true or false, is also something. An avowedly fictitious story, well told, is also something in a third way.

All three are good things in their several places. But Mr. Dendy gives us an unpleasant mixture of the three."—Sat. Rev., xv. 831.

Denison, Edward, 1840–1870, b. at Salisbury, Eng., his father being Bishop of Salisbury, (Denison, Edward, D.D., ante, vol. i.,) and educated at Eton, and at Christ Church, Oxford; was deeply interested in the condition of the London poor, and, in spite of delicate health, did much work among the East End population. In 1868 he was elected to Parliament, but his health gave way, and he undertook a voyage to Australia in 1869, and died soon after his arrival at Melbourne. Letters and other Writings of the late Edward Denison, M.P. for Newark. Edited by Sir Baldwyn Leighton, Bart. Lon., 1872, 8vo; new ed., entitled "Work among the London Poor," &c., 1884, 16mo. Privately printed.

"How much he achieved in the sphere within which he worked, until summoned to the great council of the nation, may be partly judged from his letters."—Sat. Rev., xxxii. 185.

Denison, Ven. George Anthony, [ante, vol. i., add.,] b. 1805, at Ossington, Nottinghamshire, Eng.; brother of the late J. Evelyn Denison, Viscount Ossington, and of the late Edward Denison, D.D., Bishop of Salisbury, (q. v., ante, vol. i.) He was educated at Eton, and at Christ Church, Oxford, where he graduated with honors in classics in 1826; was elected Fellow of Oriel College in 1828; became curate of Cuddesdon, Oxfordshire, in 1832, vicar of Broadwinsor, Dorset, in 1838, and vicar of East Brent, Somerset, in 1845. On his presentation to the latter vicarage he was made examining chaplain to the Bishop of Bath and Wells, who in 1851 advanced him to the archdeaconry of Taunton. He resigned his chaplaincy in 1853 on account of a charge of unsound doctrine which was made, and preached as his defence three sermons on "The Real Presence," which led to his being deprived for a time of his ecclesiastical preferments by judgment of a court presided over by the Archbishop of Canterbury. The judgment was set aside by the judicial committee of the Privy Council in 1858. The following is a selection from the list of his numerous publications, which are chiefly addresses, letters, single sermons, charges, &c. 1. An Appeal to the Clergy and Laity of the Church of England to combine for the Defence of the Church, Lon., 1850, 8vo. 2. The Real Presence, &c., [three sermons, with prefaces and appendices,] Lon., 1853, 8vo; 3d ed., 1855. 3. "A narrative where humorous gossip, personal reminiscences,—in which the great and almost feminine kindness of heart that underlies the archdeacon's official pugnacity is always bursting out,—and the water-supply of East Brent, are quaintly intertwined with solemn disquisitions on the deepest points of theology."—*Sat. "Most of the essays have a biographical element, but some of them—those, for example, upon our 'Lyrical Poetry' and upon our 'Rural Poetry'—are purely critical. In one, that upon 'John Wesley under Two Aspects,' Mr. Dennis passes the literary pale and makes a brief but by no means fruitless incursion into general English history. In all cases he is an intelligent and pleasant guide, for his manner corresponds to his matter, being remarkable for simplicity, ease, and clearness."—Spectator, l. 17.

"This brief yet clear and lightly-written account of the growth and causes of the existing depression meets a want which has long been felt by all who are interested in Irish affairs. The book consists of eighteen chapters, each dealing with some special subject,—the cause of the depression, agriculture, cattle-raising, the butter trade, textile manufactures, cottage industries, &c. . . . The book is . . . full of happy suggestions as well as information."—Ath., No. 3094.

"One of the most interesting and instructive books that have been published for many years upon Ireland. . . . There is little that can fairly be considered controversial in this book, although Mr. Dennis maintains that the causes of the decline of Irish industries are to be found in existing circumstances, and not in more or less ancient history."—Spectator, lx. 739.

"Something new has turned up in the wonderful spiritualist world. It is called Psychometry, and means a certain power possessed by people who are termed psychometers, which enables them, when any piece of matter is placed in contact with them, to see all that has ever happened to that piece of matter. . . . So far as is yet known, almost all psychometers are American ladies. The greatest are Mrs. Denton, wife of Mr. Denton, a lecturer on geology at Boston, U.S.; Mrs. Cridge, of Pennsylvania; and Mrs. Lucielle Do Viel, of Pultneyville, Wayne Co., N.Y.,—'a lady who, on examining a specimen psychometrically, not only goes to the spot from which the specimen was obtained, but has the sensation of travelling while doing so,' and who may possibly have had this gift allotted to her by the kindness of nature as some compensation for her extraordinary name."—*Sat. Deutsch, Emanuel Oscar Menahem, 1829–1873, b. at Neisse, Silesia, Germany; was educated by his uncle, David Deutsch, a learned rabbi, who trained him in Talmudic lore, and at the University of Berlin, where he supported himself by writing Jewish poems and stories for periodicals. In 1855 he was appointed to a post at the British Museum, which he retained till his death, which took place at Alexandria, after a short tour up the Nile made in search of health. He had visited Palestine in 1869. His article on the Talmud in the Quarterly Review for October, 1867, had established his reputation as the foremost Talmudic scholar of his day. To his deep research were added a reverence for the past and an ardent hope for the future of his race, which have given rise to the impression that he suggested to George Eliot the character of Mordecai in Daniel Deronda. Literary Remains: with a Brief Memoir, [by Lady Strangford,] Lon., 1874, 8vo.

"His true place in Hebrew scholarship was to have been decisively established by a great work, never completed, on the Talmud, of which the 'Quarterly' article was but the foretaste; but his lecture on 'Semitic Palæography,' 1866, his writings on Phœnician inscriptions, the Moabite Stone, &c., demonstrate an epigraphist of a high order, and his numerous articles on Semitic subjects in the 'Saturday Review,' 'Athenæum,' and other journals, reveal extensive reading and wide grasp of Oriental history and philosophy. In whatever he wrote his vividly poetic nature asserted itself; his prose is the prose of a poet and musician."—STANLEY LANE-POOLE: Dict. of Nat. Biog., xiv. 423.

"The thesis of the book, so far as there is one, is that the pre-Christian family exhibits a scene of progressive degeneracy, which is repeated, with the prospect of yet deeper degradation, in the 'after-Christian family,' as exhibited in Islam, among the French and English peasantry, and in New England."—Acad., xxx. 102.

"Mr. Devas has gathered together a great deal of interesting information on the various constitutions of the home at different times among the white and yellow races of mankind. . . . While he undoubtedly possesses many qualifications for the historical investigation of this important subject, he has preferred to treat it in a dogmatic rather than a strictly scientific spirit: he uses history to illustrate and enforce the Christian doctrine of family relationship."—Historical Review, No. 6.

The Infant Bridal, and other Poems, [selected,] Lon., 1864, 12mo. 8. Irish Odes, and other Poems, Lon., 1869, cr. 8vo. 9. The Legends of St. Patrick, Lon., 1872, 12mo.

"Blank verse, in which his book is chiefly written, is, with its vast compass and infinite variety, too mighty an instrument for his hand. Yet true glimpses of nature, picturesqueness, imagination, and even music, may be found in his principal poems."—Ath., No. 2332.

"He has given us a series of paintings in which the great missionary is no isolated and supernatural figure, but most human."—Sat. Rev., xxxiv. 541.

10. Alexander the Great: a Dramatic Poem, Lon., 1874, 12mo.

"It will compare with Sir Henry Taylor's fine drama of 'Philip van Arteveldt,' as well in general power as in the delicacy of the minuter elements of its workmanship."—Spectator, xlvii. 787.

11. St. Thomas of Canterbury: a Dramatic Poem, Lon., 1876, 12mo. 12. Antar and Zara, an Eastern Romance; Inisfail; and other Poems, Lon., 1877, 12mo. 13. Legends of the Saxon Saints, Lon., 1879, 12mo.

"The blank verse which rehearses these exploits is frequently vigorous, at times picturesque, some of the small dramatic touches being admirable; but when an occasion offers which demands fervour and brilliancy of imagination, Mr. De Vere too often loses its poetry and limits himself to little more than dry chronicle."—Ath., No. 2701.

"A book of much reflective beauty, in which we find, if not precisely a picture of the age to which it relates, at least a picture of the type of mind which diffused the finest spiritual leaven of that age."—Spectator, lii. 1103.

14. The Foray of Queen Meave, and other Legends of Ireland's Heroic Age, Lon., 1882, 12mo.

"In this volume Mr. De Vere attempts to do for the heroic lore of the Celt what Mr. William Morris has successfully accomplished for that of the Teuton."—Ath., No. 2869.

Ireland's Church Question: Five Essays, Lon., 1868, 8vo. 7. (Ed.) Proteus and Amadeus: a Correspondence, Lon., 1878, 8vo.

"This is one of the most fascinating little books on natural theology which has [sic] been published for many years back. The title is perhaps a little too scholastic; but the preface tells us that the correspondence is a genuine one."—Spectator, li. 797.

8. Constitutional and Unconstitutional Political Action, Lon., 1881. 9. Ireland and Proportional Representation, Dublin, 1885. 10. Essays: chiefly on Poetry, Lon., 1887, 2 vols. p. 8vo. (Contains essays on Wordsworth, Landor, Shelley, Keats, Spenser, on "Subjective Difficulties in Religion," &c.)

"If his writing is not marked by that unity of purpose, by that desire of the critic to keep his eye always on the object, and to concentrate his analysis, which is to be found in the school of literary criticism which looks to France for its methods, but prefers to lead the reader by more labyrinthine paths to the full appreciation of some poet's beauties, it is none the less pleasant and delightful. . . . By far the most important of the literary studies are those that treat of Wordsworth and his poetry."—Spectator, lxi. 171.

"Though holding but a subordinate rank, . . . Mr. Devereux was as qualified as any official of higher authority could be to note and record the facts which meet the eye, and to afford us the means of forming at least an approximate judgment upon them. . . . Our author's trip in company with Dr. Livingstone seems to have impressed him with the idea that the great traveller is one of the most changeable and easily led of mortals."—*Sat. Devey, Louisa. Life of Rosina, Lady Lytton: with Numerous Extracts from the MS. Autobiography and other Original Documents: published in Vindication of her Memory, Lon., 1887, 8vo.

"If one tithe of the statements contained in this volume are true, Lady Lytton was for years the victim of cruel and persistent persecution. Many of the details must be regarded as proved beyond dispute. As a wife she was deeply wronged; but even the bitterest provocation will not suffice to excuse the course of conduct which she pursued. . . . In her vindication of her heroine Miss Devey has overshot the mark. She relies implicitly on Lady Lytton's own evidence, as given in her diaries, letters, or an autobiographical and unpublished MS. called 'Nemesis.' No impartial person can fail to see that much of this evidence is extremely high-coloured."—Ath., No. 3108.

"No work has issued from the American press for many years embodying the result of more diligent and intelligent research than this massive volume. . . . It is, in fact, an original contribution, of great importance, to our religious history. . . . As an exposition of Congregationalism as a system, this volume cannot be accepted as very satisfactory. "It is a necessary consequence of the scale of his work that he should deal rather with the broad generalities than with the minute details of his subject. But, without losing sight of the proportion of different parts of the mass of laws and cognate but distinguishable customs with which he has to deal, he covers the ground in an exhaustive and scholarly manner."—Sat. Rev., lx. 848.

"The work will be of much value to those (a numerous class, we fear) who have only a general and sentimental idea of the British Constitution, as it will help them not only to summarize the principles of law on the subject, but to gauge the significance of those principles by comparison with other systems."—Ath., No. 3043.

6. England's Case against Home-Rule, Lon., 1886, p. 8vo.

"We are disposed to think that even those who disagree with the conclusions of this book will concur in conceding its extraordinary lucidity, force, and dispassionateness. . . . Mr. Dicey presents both the arguments of his opponents and his own arguments without a trace of political passion. There is not a word in the book which the strongest Home-ruler could regard as unfair, or contemptuous, or perverse. Often the Home-rulers' view is expounded with a force far greater than that with which their own organs have presented it, though Professor Dicey weighs argument against argument and finds an immense balance of weight in the opposite scale. . . . The great strength of his book consists in its analysis and discussion of the various forms of Home-rule."—Spectator, lix. 1557.

"He speaks as a strong advocate who feels he has a strong case. And within certain limits it is a strong case, having nearly every quality except that of being convincing."—Acad., xxxi. 2.

Dickens, Charles, [ante, vol. i., add.,] 1812–1870, ("entered in the baptismal register of Portsea as Charles John Huffham, though on the very rare occasions when he subscribed that name he wrote Huffam.") In the year 1858, to which the latest entries in vol. i. belong, Dickens began the course of public readings from his works, which was continued at intervals, during the twelve remaining years of his life, in London and the provinces, and in 1867–68 in many of the principal towns of the United States. In the same year he separated from his wife, and took steps for severing his connection with Household Words, which in the following year was discontinued, and followed by the establishment of All the Year Round. In 1860 he sold his residence in London, "Tavistock House," and established his permanent residence at Gadshill. His incessant labors and multifarious activity are supposed to have hastened his death, which occurred very suddenly, though not without premonitory symptoms throughout all his late years. His popularity as a writer seems to have suffered no diminution, at least in the twelve years succeeding his death, during which period the sale of his works in England amounted to 4,239,000 volumes. The following list includes the books mentioned ante, vol. i., where very few dates are appended. The Humour and Pathos of Charles Dickens: with Illustrations of his Mastery of the Terrible and the Picturesque. Selected by Charles Kent. Lon., 1884.

"It would, of course, be against all experience to suppose that to future generations Dickens, as a writer, will be all that he was to his own. Much that constitutes the subject, or at least furnishes the background, of his pictures of English life, . . . has vanished, or is being improved off the face of the land. The form, again, of Dickens's principal works may become obsolete, as it was in a sense accidental. He was the most popular novelist of his day; but should prose fiction, or even the full and florid species of it which has enjoyed so long-lived a favour, ever be out of season, the popularity of Dickens's books must experience an inevitable diminution. . . . Nature, when she gifted Dickens with sensibility, observation, and imagination, had bestowed upon him yet another boon in the quality which seems more prominent than any other in his whole being. The vigour of Dickens—a mental and moral vigour supported by a splendid physical organism—was the parent of some of his foibles; amongst the rest, of his tendency to exaggeration. . . . But without this vigour he could not have been creative as he was; and in him there were accordingly united with rare completeness a swift responsiveness to the impulses of humour and pathos, an inexhaustible fertility in discovering and inventing materials for their exercise, and the constant creative desire to give to these newly-created materials a vivid plastic form."—A. Dickens, Charles, eldest son of the novelist, b. 1837; editor of All the Year Round and of Household Words; has issued a series of hand-books under the title of Dickens's Dictionary of London, Paris, the Thames, the University of Cambridge, and the University of Oxford, Lon., 1879 et seq. (Ed.) The Life of Charles James Mathews: chiefly Autobiographical: with Selections from his Correspondence and Speeches, Lon., 1879, 2 vols.

"All that is strange, diversified, alluring, and uncomfortable in the life of an actor is illustrated in the career of Charles Mathews. . . . Mr. Dickens has discharged competently and gracefully his task of editor. So little obtrusion of self is there, it is only in the short prefatory explanation that we hear of him or recognize his existence. . . . The papers with which he deals had been arranged by Mathews himself."—Ath., No. 2697.

"It is full of anecdotes, nearly all of them fresh and well told. Mathews's frequent letters are as light and sprightly as possible."—Nation, xxix. 246.

Dilke, Sir Charles Wentworth, Bart., LL.B., b. 1843, in London; son of the late Sir Charles Wentworth Dilke, and grandson of Charles Wentworth Dilke, supra. He graduated as head of the Law Tripos at Trinity Hall, Cambridge, in 1866; was called to the bar at the Middle Temple 1866; elected M.P. for the borough of Chelsea 1868, and re-elected 1874; was appointed under-secretary of state for foreign affairs in 1880; became president of the local government board, with a seat in the cabinet, 1882. In 1885–86 his name was before the public in connection with the divorce case of Crawford v. Crawford, and in 1886 he lost his seat in Parliament and retired from public life. 1. Lon., 1868, 2 vols. 8vo; 8th ed., with additional chapters on English Influence in Japan and China, &c., 1885, 1 vol. p. 8vo.

"The defects of Mr. Dilke's work are a certain excess of statement, a considerable crudity of opinion as to the principles which govern the formation of societies, some of the pedantry of travel, and somewhat too much readiness to believe in the grandeur of England because you meet English squatters in Australia and English-speaking barbarians in Nevada or Colorado. Its merits are that it is written in a lively and agreeable style, that it implies a great deal of physical pluck, that no page of it fails to show an acute and highly intelligent observer, that it stimulates the imagination as well as the judgment of the reader, and that it is on perhaps the most interesting subject that can attract an Englishman who cares about his country."—*Sat. "The first sentence of the first essay in this reprint from the 'Fortnightly Review' runs as follows: 'The present position of the European world is one in which sheer force holds a larger place than it has held in modern times since the fall of Napoleon.' The words constitute the keynote of the writer's inquiry into the present state of Europe and the means which the different countries possess of enforcing their views and aspirations by the sword."—Ath., No. 3120.

7. The British Army, Lon., 1888, 8vo.

"Provided with a mass of information and professional opinion, he supports his statements of military weakness with facts the truth of which cannot be gainsaid. When, however, he comes to remedies, his lack of professional training leads him, in our opinion, occasionally into error. . . . Sir Charles Dilke would have two armies,—a long-service one for India and the East, and a short-service one for duty at home and in the Mediterranean. . . . A most valuable, practical, and pregnant book. If it does nothing else, it will instruct the public and give the authorities cause for reflection."—Ath., No. 3162.

Disraeli, Benjamin, Earl of Beaconsfield, [ante, vol. i., add.,] 1804–1881. In February, 1858, Mr. Disraeli became chancellor of the exchequer for the second time, resigning with the rest of the ministry in June, 1859, and remaining in opposition till July, 1866, when the third Derby administration was formed, Disraeli again becoming chancellor of the exchequer, and in February, 1868, succeeding Lord Derby as premier. On the defeat of the government in the general election of that year he resigned office, in December, without waiting for Parliament to assemble. In February, 1874, his party returned to power with an immense Parliamentary majority, and its six years' tenure of office, with Disraeli at its head, was distinguished by a bolder and more active foreign policy than that of any former administration for a long period, leading to the treaty of Berlin, 1878, and a new invasion of Afghanistan, and exciting a strong agitation and conflict of opinion at home, the final result being the overthrow of the government in April, 1880, when the prime minister retired from office with the title of Earl of Beaconsfield, and his political career, one of the most extraordinary in English history, came to an end. 1. "The controversial part of the book is subordinate to the decorative effects in which Mr. Disraeli delights as heartily as when Lord Codlingsby, five-and-twenty years ago, visited Rafael Mendoza at his sumptuous palace in Holywell Street. The true precursor of the author of 'Lothair' was the biographer of Aladdin. . . . There is always something attractive in the preservation through maturity of the innocent tastes of early life; and it is pleasant to find that Mr. Disraeli still cherishes the ducal illusions which fascinated his youth."—Sat. Rev., xxix. 611.

"As a story the book will probably be found disappointing. . . . Vividly as the figures are for the moment brought before the reader, they come somewhat like shadows and so they depart. . . . It is excellently written, and the author has never so fully proved himself able to produce quiet, graceful English prose. It is full of epigrammatic turns of thought and speech, less ostentatiously sparkling than of old, perhaps, but still of the old stamp."—Ath., No. 2770.

"In none of his former works has he indulged so largely and with so little disguise in his favourite reproduction of real personages in a more or less transparent mask."—Sat. Rev., l. 707.

"It enables the reader to form a just estimate of the most brilliant debater of his day, and to study the several phases of his development as an artist in speech. . . . The speeches contained in it have one and all the virtue—not common in displays of oratory—of being eminently readable."—Ath., No. 2834.

[Edited by Ralph Disraeli.] Lon., 1885, p. 8vo.

"Contains wisdom as well as wit, and it abounds with passages which could have only been penned by a man of warm feelings as well as of genius."—Sat. Rev., lix. 732.

11. Correspondence with his Sister, 1832–1852. [Edited by Ralph Disraeli.] Lon., 1885–86, p. 8vo.

"The new volume helps his readers to trace his mental history through the twenty years in which he made most of his fame as an author, and, devoting himself even more zealously to politics than to literature, gradually worked his way up to an almost unique position in English politics. . . . There is not a dull or uninstructive page in this volume."—Ath., No. 3039.

"It is seldom, indeed, that a book contains so much evidence alike of independent thought and of conscientious labour. The result must surely be to aid largely in displacing those crude superficial views of the great religious movement of the sixteenth century which the careless, uncritical pen of Burnet vindicated to the satisfaction of an age that believed in the Popish Plot."—Ath., No. 2624.

Dixon, William Hepworth, F.G.S., F.S.A., [ante, vol. i., add.,] 1821–1879, b. at Great Ancoats, Manchester, Eng.; moved to London in 1846, and was called to the bar in 1854, but never practised. He was editor of the London Athenæum from 1853 to 1869. He made many journeys during the later years of his life, visiting Spain and Portugal in 1861, the East in 1863, the United States in 1866 and again in 1874, Russia in 1869, Cyprus in 1878, &c. 1. New America, 1867, 2 vols. 8vo; 8th ed., 1869.

"The book is readable from end to end, more so, we think, than any book of American travel that has been written for a good many years. . . . The accounts of all his strange acquaintances, the free-lovers of Oneida, the Shaker monks and nuns, the Tunker celibates, are equally full of interest and information. . . . We might transfer half his pages to our columns and not exhaust his store of what in our opinion is extremely readable writing."—Nation, iv. 165.

7. Spiritual Wives, Lon., 1868, 2 vols. 8vo; 4th ed. same year. (An action for libel brought by the author in consequence of a mention of this book in the Pall Mall Gazette, in which he was accused of indecency, resulted in a verdict in his favor, with damages of one farthing.) 8. Her Majesty's Tower, Lon., 1869–71, 4 vols. 8vo; 7th ed., 1885, 1 vol.

"The book is not a novel; it is not a topographical or architectural book; it is not a history in any intelligible sense of the word. It is simply a book in which the Tower of London is made into a peg on which to hang a great deal of sketchy writing about various people, mainly people who had to do with the Tower by being prisoners therein."—Sat. Rev., xxvii. 183.

9. Free Russia. Illust. Lon., 1870, 2 vols. 8vo; 3d ed. same year. 10. Secret History of "The International" Working-Men's Association. By Onslow Yorke, [pseud.] Lon., 1871, 12mo. 11. The Switzers, Lon., 1872, 8vo.

"Mr. Dixon offers in this volume to the public a number of short and easily-read chapters on Swiss natives, Swiss economics, religion, education, politics, and military organization. . . . Critics must regard the volume merely as a production for the day."—Ath., No. 2307.

"He seems really to have looked with some care into the state of education in Switzerland. . . . To be sure, the subject is brought in and sent out with a flourish; but, if we may liken Mr. Dixon's arrangement to a sandwich, he gives us a good thick slice of solid meat in the middle."—*Sat. 12. History of Two Queens: I. Catharine of Aragon; II. Anne Boleyn, Lon., 1873–74, 4 vols. 8vo.

"We must confess that we cannot concur in Mr. Dixon's historical judgments generally. But we are bound to say that the work throughout bears evidence of great research; and in the hands of a writer of Mr. Dixon's talents a book on such a subject of course could not fail to be interesting."—Ath., No. 2417.

"That Mr. Dixon has admirers is plain. . . . What kind of people they can be who are not disgusted with his ceaseless false glare and glitter, with his constant sacrifice of truth and sense to mere sound, is beyond our power of guessing."—Sat. Rev., xxxvii. 532

13. White Conquest, Lon., 1875, 2 vols. 8vo.

"Mr. Dixon is, we venture to think, better as a traveller than as an historian. . . . He is more at home in painting an Indian squaw or a Mormon wife than in drawing the portraits of Anne Boleyn or Katherine of Aragon. . . . He 'interviewed' President Grant, General Sheridan, and a good many other people; and perhaps they have no right to complain that his comments on their characters and personal appearance are as outspoken and minute as anything that a Yankee 'special' has written about European men of mark."—Ath., No. 2505.

14. Diana, Lady Lyle, Lon., 1877, 3 vols. p. 8vo.

"Mr. Dixon's book is undoubtedly original. The reader's attention is at once aroused, and his interest kept alive throughout. . . . Our experience of novels makes us pronounce Mr. Dixon's feat in showing us all the kingdoms of the earth in a moment of time to be a success."—Ath., No. 2573.

Dobson, Henry Austin, b. 1840, at Plymouth, Eng.; son of George Clarisse Dobson, a civil engineer; was intended for his father's profession, and was educated in Wales and at Strasburg, but on returning to England in 1856 he gave up that profession, and was appointed to a clerkship in the Board of Trade, which he has retained ever since. He began to write for St. Paul's Magazine on its establishment under the editorship of Anthony Trollope in 1868, and has also contributed to the Cornhill and other English magazines and to the Century and Harper's Magazine. He was one of the first to introduce into English poetry the old French lyrical forms. 1. Vignettes in Rhyme and Vers de Société, Lon., 1873; 2d ed., 1874, 12mo. 2. The Civil Service Hand-Book of English Literature, Lon., 1874; 2d ed., 1879, cr. 8vo. 3. Proverbs in Porcelain, and other Verses, Lon., 1877, p. 8vo; 2d ed., 1878.

"It is too bad. Mr. Dobson can give us something better than this. . . . It is not of the poet's words that we have to complain,—in the present instance the rhymes are almost faultily faultless, annoyingly finished,—but of the absence of thought to inhabit the words."—Spectator, l. 979.

4. Hogarth, ("Great Artists,") Lon., 1879, p. 8vo. 5. (Ed.) Eighteenth Century Essays: Selected and Annotated, ("Parchment" Lib.,) Lon., 1882, fp. 8vo.

"His text is an example of accuracy and neatness. His notes are apt and pertinent. His introductory essay is clearly and gracefully written. . . . Mr. Dobson has wisely avoided the severer parts of his material, and his selection is mainly confined to sketches of character and manners, and those chiefly of the humorous kind."—Ath., No. 2858.

6. (Ed.) Fables of John Gay: with a Memoir, ("Parchment" Lib.,) Lon., 1882, 12mo. 7. Old-World Idylls, and other Verses, Lon., 1883, 18mo. (A selection, previously published in America, chiefly from "Vignettes in Rhyme" and "Proverbs in Porcelain," those volumes being out of print.) 8. Fielding, ("English Men of Letters,") Lon., 1883, p. 8vo.

"His design has been to exhibit Fielding, not himself; to tell the story of Fielding's life, so far as the very scanty materials available for such a tale have allowed him, without pausing at every possible or impossible opportunity to air his own views either as critic or moralist."—Sat. Rev., lv. 573.

"Mr. Dobson's volume is, we think, more painstaking than attractive."—Spectator, lvi. 1131.

9. Thomas Bewick and his Pupils. Illust. Lon., 1884, sq. 16mo.

"Mr. Dobson's high appreciation of Bewick and his innate love of art, together with his literary power, combine to make his book an extremely pleasant one for the reader. . . . He has access to the best sources of information now available, and gives us many facts not previously known." —Sat. Rev., lviii. 411.

10. At the Sign of the Lyre, Lon., 1885, 18mo. (This volume contains poems reprinted from "Vignettes in Rhyme" and "Proverbs in Porcelain," with others republished from magazines.)

"On the whole, we prefer it even to the author's 'Old-World Idylls.' Mr. Dobson has a niche of his own in England's Poets' Corner, and is not, we venture to think, wholly mortal."—Sat. Rev., lx. 656.

11. Sir Richard Steele, ("English Worthies,") Lon., 1886, p. 8vo.

"No living writer is better qualified than Mr. Dobson, by his knowledge of the period and by the love of it, to write the life of Steele. . . . His monograph is full of matter, keen in criticism, brilliant in execution, and not likely to be superseded."—Spectator, lix. 1450.

12. Life of Oliver Goldsmith, ("Great Writers,") Lon., 1887, 12mo. He has also edited Selected Poems of Oliver Goldsmith: with an Introduction, Oxf., 1881, 12mo.

General Criticism:

"He reigns where Prior and Praed have reigned before him, and this is no little thing to say of any man. . . . He is not merely a writer of vers de société: he is a fabulist, a dramatist in parvo, a lyrist pure and simple. The only occasions upon which he seems to me to fail are those in which he attempts the romantic and heroic styles. . . . But in his own way, how perfect an artist, how exquisite a poet! . . . He is always the same acute and refined observer; passing lightly over the surface of things, . . . and touching the harmonious frivolities of by-gone times as the fingers of some maestro might lightly run over the keys of an old-fashioned harpsichord."—E. W. Gosse: Essays from The Critic, 112.

"A practical study of the life of the Plains, made by an officer whose duties and tastes have kept him hunting the Indians and the game that he here describes during much of his twenty-five years' service. . . . He has made an interesting book, whose very simplicity attests its truth, and the subjects discussed give it value."—Nation, xxiv. 91.

"He gives the most exhaustive practical account of the beasts of the prairies and fowls of the air that we have ever met with. But he also supplies a complete and comprehensive sketch of the physical configuration of the United States territories from the Mississippi Valley westward to the great mountain-ranges, and from the Canadian line on the north to the Mexican frontier to the southward. . . . A great part of his book is devoted to the 'noble savage,' of whom, we may remark in passing, he entertains the meanest opinion. But we doubt whether any man since the days of Catlin has written on the subject with better information or authority; while the vivacity and evident fidelity of many of his picturesque descriptions remind us greatly of the inimitable Ruxton, and we can scarcely give them higher commendation."—*Sat. "The author seems to have selected Moslemism, Buddhism, and Christianity as typical or representative examples of three leading phases of religious growth and belief, rather on the principle of analyzing and discriminating between their essential differences, than upon that which forms the aim of most of the able investigators of comparative theology now so numerous,—the tracing of their mutual analogies and resemblances."—Spectator, li. 250.

He was called to the bar in 1841, and in 1842 emigrated to New Zealand, his departure from England being mourned by his intimate friend Robert Browning in the poem entitled Waring. He filled in succession nearly all the chief administrative offices in New Zealand, including that of secretary to the colony, (1851,) and that of prime minister, (1862–63.) In 1871 he retired from public life and returned to England. 1. Venice, [a poem,] Lon., 1839, p. 8vo. 2. Ranolf and Amohia: a South-Sea Day-Dream, Lon., 1872, cr. 8vo; new ed., rev., 1883, 2 vols.

"There is power, buoyancy, intellectual subtlety, and vivid pictures enough in this book to make out a great many poems which would strike the attention of every critic with the least critical insight; but whether the whole makes a poem we are by no means sure. . . . There can be no doubt that its author is a man of great originality and buoyant imaginative life."—Spectator, xlv. 1332.

3. Flotsam and Jetsam: Rhymes Old and New, Lon., 1877, sq. 16mo.

"Mr. Domett's shorter poems resemble his long and striking New Zealand poem in this, that they are always graphic, often brilliant, and generally full of force. What, with one or two exceptions, they want is the subduing lyrical feeling which warms and modulates and breathes through the whole. . . . The key-note is not given by feeling, but by thought."—Spectator, l. 510.

"Every fresh perusal of his work only serves to show beauties not previously observed; and one does not wonder that Mr. Browning thought his 'Ranolf and Amohia' a great and astonishing performance, of very varied beauty and power, or that Lord Tennyson wrote of it as possessing 'intellectual subtlety, great power of delineating delicious scenery, and imaginative fire.' In truth, it is by far the finest long poem yet written in Australasia."—Acad., xxxiv. 382.

Donaldson, John William, D.D., [ante, vol. i., add.,] 1811–1861, b. in London; gained the first prize in Greek at University College, London, 1830, and was afterwards scholar at Trinity College, Cambridge, and on graduating in 1834 was elected Fellow and tutor of Trinity. From 1841 to 1851 he was head-master of King Edward's School, Bury St. Edmunds. On resigning that position he settled in Cambridge, where he won a high reputation as a tutor and classical scholar. "In this remarkable work he endeavoured to show that fragments of a book of Jashar are to be found throughout the Old Testament Scriptures up to the time of Solomon, that the book was compiled in the reign of that monarch, and that its remains constitute 'the religious marrow of the Scriptures.' Professor Aldis Wright praised the ingenuity of the theory; Thomas Love Peacock declared that it was of itself sufficient proof of Donaldson's genius; but it seems to have been generally felt that it rests far too absolutely on hazardous speculation."—RICHARD GARNETT: *Dict. of Nat. "His aim is to illuminate the heavier pages of history by anecdote and gossip, which, while amusing the reader, may also convey some impression of the political and social life of the epoch he describes. . . . He is the veriest lover of chatter. Research, dates, changes in administration, party feuds, and the like, bore him supremely; but he can tell a story well, he can describe character, he delights in a good gossip over a scandal as much as a woman or a Frenchman, he appreciates humour, and his scent is never at fault whenever any of those incidents that bring out the weaknesses of women or the vices of men break cover."—A. Doughty, Charles Montagu, M.A., b. 1843, at Theberton Hall, Saxmundham, Suffolk; brother of Henry Montagu Doughty, infra; educated at private schools and at a school for the royal navy, Portsmouth, and graduated at Gonville and Caius College, Cambridge, 1864. He has travelled extensively on the Continent and in the East. 1. Documents épigraphiques recueillis dans le Nord de l'Arabie. "An author who takes Arabia for his field challenges comparison with the greatest modern writers of travel. It is the highest tribute we can pay Mr. Doughty to own that, with the charm of Burckhardt and Burton, Palgrave and Palmer, undiminished upon us, we judge his book to be the most remarkable record of adventure and research which has been published to this generation. He enjoyed opportunities that the experience of no one of his predecessors combined. He describes the life of the nomads with a minuteness and colour that will make his work stand for the Bedouin what Lane's famous description is for the modern Egyptians, while he succeeds in carving out individual characters from groups and classes in a way that Lane never attempted."—Spectator, lxi. 480.

"The extraordinary merits of Mr. Doughty's travels . . . may possibly, we fear, be veiled at least to the general reader by some of the features of their presentation. The author in his preface remarks that his book is not milk for babes; a hasty critic, with not much knowledge and little patience, might say that it is something much more like nails and gravel for ostriches. It is immensely long. . . . It is written in a most miraculous style, suggesting a mixture of Mr. William Morris, Mr. George Meredith, the late Mr. Carlyle, and the living Sir Richard Burton. . . . As for the scientific results of his work, it is sufficient to say that his recovered inscriptions were printed by the Paris Institute, that authorities like M. Renan and the Marquis de Vogüé have acknowledged the light they cast on the mysterious Nabathæan monarchy, and the relation of its civilization to Greece on the one hand and to Islam on the other. . . . As for the book itself, we wish that it could be compressed, and to a certain extent translated; but its value as a storehouse of knowledge simply cannot be exaggerated."—Sat. Rev., lxv. 391.

"The Chinese words are expressed in the Roman character, and this will undoubtedly prove to be a great drawback to the usefulness of the Dictionary. . . . Mr. Douglas holds out the hope that he may publish in a few years a key to the present work, in which he promises to supply as many of the Chinese characters as it is possible to identify. Douglass, Frederick, b. 1817, at Tuckahoe, near Easton, Md.; was a slave on the plantation of Col. Edward Lloyd, his mother being a negro slave and his father a white man. He escaped in 1838 and went to New Bedford, Mass., where he changed his name from Lloyd to Douglass. He became an agent of the Massachusetts Anti-Slavery Society, and in 1845 went to Europe and lectured on slavery in the principal towns of Great Britain. In 1846 he was manumitted according to law through money subscribed in England. He was U.S. marshal for the District of Columbia 1876–81, and afterwards recorder of deeds for the District, and in 1889 was appointed minister to Hayti. 1. Dowden, Edward, LL.D., b. 1843, in Cork, Ireland; was educated at Queen's College, Cork, and at Trinity College, Dublin, where he gained the vice-chancellor's prizes in English verse and English prose, and the first senior moderatorship in logic and ethics. He was a student in divinity for two years. In 1867 he obtained by examination a professorship of oratory in the University of Dublin, where he was afterwards elected professor of English literature. He has contributed to the leading English reviews and weekly periodicals. 1. Shakspere: a Critical Study of his Mind and Art, Lon., 1875, 8vo; 5th ed., 1880.

"There can be no doubt that he has an unusual insight into the broader as well as the nicer meanings of Shakspeare. In a manner which may be termed 'an honest method, as wholesome as sweet,' he traces by some certain and some supposed steps the growth of Shakspeare's faculties and the course of their development, taking the plays now singly, now in groups, and assigning them to their place in the order which he has found for their creation."—Sat. Rev., xxxix. 351.

"Professor Dowden's study of the man Shakspere seems to me the best work of the kind that has been written in our language. . . . The great body of the work is built on sound induction, out of which no more is drawn than has been put into it."—R. SIMPSON: Acad., vii. 211.

2. Poems, Lon., 1876, p. 8vo; 2d ed., 1877.

"Professor Dowden is . . . an echo, not a voice. His verses remind us in turns of Milton, who is a favourite model, of Mr. Matthew Arnold, of Wordsworth, and of other poets, but lack any strongly-asserted individual gift or quality."—Ath., No. 2579.

(Contains essays, chiefly reprinted from periodicals, on Landor, Tennyson, Browning, George Eliot, Whitman, Hugo, Lamennais, Quinet, &c.)

"Generally Professor Dowden's criticisms, whether we accept them or not, must be admitted to be of much weight as far as they go; and that, in the direction of stimulating thought, is . . . a very long way."—GEORGE SAINTSBURY: Acad., xiii. 405.

"It appears to us impossible to read many pages of Mr. Dowden's critiques without discovering that the power of the commonplace is ubiquitous and inevitable, and that we vainly seek to escape from it by flying from the world's common objects and interests. For there is a commonplace of culture and refinement yet more tyrannical than that which we have left, and the critics are fast elevating it into a fine art."—Sat. Rev., xlv. 798.

6. Southey, ("English Men of Letters,") Lon., 1880, p. 8vo.

"To wide knowledge of English literature, not confined to favourite authors, but extending over the whole field, Mr. Dowden adds a trained insight into real excellence which enables him to take a just measure of his author, neither unduly exalting him, nor conceding too much to the contemporary disparagement from which his author suffers. And his narrative is enriched by a calm and mellowed tone of reflection which throws a charm over even the commoner incidents."—Spectator, liii. 403.

7. (Ed.) The Correspondence of Robert Southey and Caroline Bowles; to which are added Correspondence with Shelley, and Southey's Dream: with an Introduction, Dublin, 1881, 8vo.

"Professor Dowden, than whom no man living, except perhaps Sir Henry Taylor, could be more fitted to execute the delicate task, has done his work of editing with all the tact and taste which can be wished. . . . It does not, indeed, shed any new light upon the character or career of Southey,—no new light was needed there,—but it gives a charming miniature study of one of those rare women of sympathetic nature who interest us so much as the satellites of genius. Caroline Bowles demands half our attention in this book, and the other half is claimed by the singular relations between Southey and Shelley which are now for the first time revealed."—Sat. Rev., liii. 20.

"The reason why Southey's correspondence with the lady who eventually became his second wife has waited so long for publication must be taken to be that which, as Professor Dowden tells us, has induced on the present occasion the printing of a mere selection from it, namely, the voluminous correspondence of Southey which already exists in type. . . As Miss Bowles got more familiar with her patron she dropped something of the adoring attitude, developed a pleasant wit, and frequently manifested decided opinions of her own; while Southey on his side fell into the delightful vein of gossiping letter-writing which he could work when he chose, and which shows not the Southey of the 'Quarterly Review,' but the Southey of 'The Doctor.'"—Ath., No. 2826.

8. (Ed.) The Sonnets of William Shakspere, Lon., 1881, sm. 8vo; new ed., 1882.

"Professor Dowden's is the only edition of Shakspere's sonnets with notes sufficiently full, yet not overdone. It is the best as containing the soundest views and most efficiently explaining the relations of the Sonnets to one another and to Shakspere."—F. J. Furnivall: Acad., xx. 154.

9. The Life of Percy Bysshe Shelley, Lon., 1886, 2 vols. 8vo.

"At last the world is in possession of that complete life of Shelley, sanctioned by his family and embodying their hitherto carefully reserved materials, which has often been asked for, and sometimes demanded with a certain degree of impatience. . . . By the Shelley family, the Erdaile family, (Shelley's grandchildren through his first daughter, Ianthe,) Mr. Forman, Mr. Slack, (in respect of the curious and important Hitchener Correspondence,) and others, Professor Dowden has been furnished with matter hitherto unknown or imperfectly known; and he has made good use of it. He writes in the spirit which befits a biographer of Shelley. He believes in Shelley's poetry and his genius; discerns that his character was in some respects singularly beautiful, and his opinions ardent and sincere, if extreme; is willing to believe in his general goodness if he can find adequate grounds for doing so; and scrutinizes the evidence in the hope of finding such grounds, but with a reluctant willingness to give judgment against him on particular points if that proves to be the only course consistent with the evidence. He dwells on nothing invidiously, but adversely on various things. . . . His essential though sympathetic moderation of tone is matched by his equability of language: he avoids controversy as far as possible, and is never overheated. On occasion he exhibits an incident or describes a scene with effect; but he does not strive to be incisive, or to stimulate the reader to strong and one-sided conclusions. The book is readable rather than powerful or pictorial."—Ath., No. 3085.

"Mr. Dowden has given us such a picture of the man as for fidelity, literalness, and fulness of detail may never again be equalled. He has done everything for Shelley that industry, insight, faithfulness, and loyalty could do. But the total effect produced is not invigorating to the better part of our sympathies. . . . Notwithstanding Shelley's earnestness, his sincerity, his unselfishness, his sympathy, his tenderness, and, above all, his inexpressible charm, the story of his life is a splendid performance that is not calculated to do the world much good."—T. Hall Caine: Acad., xxx. 373.

10. Transcripts and Studies, Lon., 1888, p. 8vo.

"Occasionally Mr. Dowden allows the wealth of decorative language of which he is a master to get the better of him and serve as a substitute for thought; but this is not often, and for the most part his criticism is as thoughtful as it is happily expressed."—Spectator, lxii. 204.

"Mr. Dowell's work may fairly be called good, though it might easily have been very much better. . . . A little more constructive skill would have halved the bulk of the work, and a dozen or a score of tables would have doubled its value. . . . The financial history of the last two centuries is told in excessive detail, and told twice over. The earlier part, to which most students will look with especial interest, is meagre in the extreme."—Sat. Rev., lix. 23.

Doyle, Sir Francis Hastings Charles, Bart., D.C.L., 1810–1888, b. at Nunappleton, near Tadcaster, Yorkshire; was educated at Eton, and at Christ Church, Oxford, where he graduated, first class Lit. Hum., in 1832, and was afterwards elected Fellow of All Souls College. He was called to the bar at the Inner Temple in 1837; was appointed receiver-general of customs in 1846, and a commissioner of customs in 1869. In 1867 he was elected to the chair of poetry at Oxford, which he held for ten years, being re-elected in 1872. 1. Miscellaneous Verses, Lon., 1834, 8vo; new ed., enl., 1840. 2. "Few poets have combined more happily a manly interest in contemporary life with an imaginative appreciation of classical beauty."—Sat. Rev., xxiii. 20.

6. Lectures on Poetry, delivered before the University of Oxford in 1868, Lon., 1869, p. 8vo.

"For the most part the lectures are rightly devoted to inquiries into some of the elements of poetry. . . . They are for the most part singularly graceful in style, displaying the command of language which is best attained in prose by the sedulous cultivation of verse."—Sat. Rev., xxvii. 318.

7. Lectures on Poetry, delivered at Oxford. Second Series. Lon., 1877, cr. 8vo.

"The most thoughtful and instructive of the lectures are devoted to the inexhaustible subject of Shakespeare."—Sat. Rev., xliii. 420.

8. Reminiscences and Opinions, 1813–1885, Lon., 1886, 8vo; 3d ed. same year.

"The best of Sir Francis Doyle's reminiscences date from a period prior to 1846. . . . He is out of sympathy with the political life of the present day, and the tone of some of his later recollections and opinions is old-fashioned, if not discordant. But, taking the volume as a whole, the reminiscences are those of a genial man of wide culture and broad sympathies; and they form a collection of anecdotes which, as the production of a single man, is unrivalled in interest, in variety, and in novelty."—Ath., No. 3077.

Doyle, James E. 1. A Chronicle of England, B.C. 55–A.D. 1485. (Illustrated by the Author.) Lon., 1863, r. 8vo.

"It is a volume which, both in its text and in its illustrations, bears witness to real and conscientious work on the part of the author."—Sat. Rev., xvi. 704.

2. The Official Baronage of England: showing the Succession, Dignities, and Offices of Every Peer from 1066 to 1885: with 1600 Illustrations, Lon., 1886, 3 vols. 4to. Also, large-paper edition of 120 copies.

"Mr. Doyle has placed students under a great obligation by the monumental work on which he has been so long engaged. These three volumes, so far as they go, must supersede every previous publication of the kind."—Sat. Rev., lxi. 21.

"The author of these three handsome quarto volumes has employed half a lifetime in the production of a book which is absolutely unique both in its design and execution. . . . The few mistakes which disfigure this useful book are chiefly found in lives of peers of the Anglo-Norman period, where Mr. Doyle has been content to repeat the received story without critical examination."—E. C. WATERS: Acad., xxix. 121.

Doyle, John Andrew, b. 1844, in London, educated at Eton, and at Balliol College, Oxford, where he graduated, first class Lit. Hum., in 1867, and gained the Arnold prize in 1869; was elected Fellow of All Souls, and appointed Vinerian reader of civil and English law. 1. The American Colonies previous to the Declaration of Independence. The Arnold Prize Essay for 1869. Lon., Oxf., and Cambridge, 1869, 8vo. 2. History of America, ("Historical Course for Schools,") Lon., 1875, 18mo. 3. The English in America: Virginia, Maryland, and the Carolinas, Lon., 1882, 8vo.

"The volume before us is—because of the author's knowledge of the subject, based upon study and thorough research—the best and most authentic history of these Southern American colonies that we have yet met with."—Acad., xxii. 356.

"'The aim of this book,' he says, 'is to describe and explain the process by which a few scattered colonies along the Atlantic seaboard grew into that vast Confederate Republic, the United States of America.' . . . It is a genuine pleasure, and rare as it is genuine, to read a work of a historical character which, like this, . . . is serious without being dull, and animated without showing partisanship."—Spectator, lvi. 86.

"Mr. Doyle's stand-point is not that of a sociologist, but of a student of institutional history. . . . He has enjoyed remarkable facilities for examining colonial documents preserved in the State Paper Office in London. . . . Mr. Doyle has viewed the English side of America, and he is consequently better able than most Americans to appreciate the principle of English continuity in our colonial constitution."—Nation, xxxvi. 367.

4. The English in America: the Puritan Colonies, Lon., 1886, 2 vols. 8vo.

"The thoroughness of Mr. Doyle's researches is conspicuous in every chapter of this history. Whenever and wherever contemporary MSS. materials exist, they have been carefully studied. In their absence the most reliable authorities have been consulted, and, when necessary, compared, so as to arrive at the nearest possible truth; and all this, we think, has been done with judgment and success."—W. NOEL SAINSBURY: Acad., xxxi. 121.

"He has gone over the field so often travelled in part by our specialists, and so thoroughly explored as a whole by Dr. Palfrey, and he gives us an admirable résumé of the facts and of the impressions made by them upon the mind of an educated Englishman. . . . These two volumes . . . are attractive in style, full of careful research, impartial in judgment, and doubly valuable as giving the opinions of one not blinded to our faults by ties of birth or education."—Nation, xlv. 489.

"We are heartily of opinion that, despite the value of what scholars on this side of the Atlantic have written about the Puritan colonies in America, this work of Doyle's excels all."—Critic, viii. 228.

"Dr. Draper takes one cause, climate, . . . and makes it account for nearly every social phenomenon with which he has to deal. . . . Of the narrative portion of Dr. Draper's work we cannot speak too highly. His sketch of the events which led to the war, and his summing of the Northern and Southern sides of the controversy, are models of calm, perspicuous, and judicial statements. . . . His book, as a whole, will edify a large public indifferent to military criticism and accuracy of military detail."—Nation, v. 207, and xi. 94.

"The most interesting chapters in the book are those on spectrum analysis, which show that the author is to be added to the list of those who preceded Kirchhoff in suggesting and applying this wonderful method; doing everything, in fact, but complete the invention and generalize the principles on which it rests."—Nation, xxviii. 55.

"In this country the name of Dr. Draper became famous in one hour. . . . The celebrated Belfast address of Professor Tyndall, and the thoroughness of his expressed trust in the accuracy and ability of Dr. Draper, sent many people with a rush to the perusal of his works. . . . It was unfortunate, however, for the reputation of Dr. Draper that the great eulogium of Professor Tyndall was pronounced not on his scientific but on his literary works. For, as these 'Memoirs' show, Dr. Draper has been for many years a careful, diligent, and successful worker in the physical departments of science, and has, without question, extended the boundaries of our scientific knowledge. . . . His fame as a man of science is secure, but his place as a philosopher and as a historian rests on a very precarious foundation."—Spectator, lii. 586.

Drummond, Henry, [ante, vol. i., add.,] 1786–1860, son of a prominent London banker of the same name; was educated at Harrow, and at Christ Church, Oxford, where he founded the professorship of political economy in 1825. From 1847 till his death he was M.P. for West Surrey. He was closely connected with Edward Irving and the Catholic Apostolic Church, and his writings are chiefly in defence of its doctrines. 1. "To those who take a stronger interest in character and intellectual power than in Parliamentary tactics or in the public business of a former generation, Mr. Drummond's speeches will be more attractive than the judicious orations of Peel or the clever rhetorical exercitations of Macaulay." —Sat. Rev., x. 177.

Drummond, Henry, B.Sc., F.G.S., F.R.S.E., b. 1852, at Stirling, Scotland; educated at Edinburgh and at Tübingen; was appointed professor of natural history and science in the Free Church College, Glasgow, in 1879. He has travelled extensively, with scientific objects, in Africa, &c. 1. Natural Law in the Spiritual World, Lon., 1883, p. 8vo; 23d ed., (82d thousand,) 1888.

"No one who reads the papers entitled 'Biogenesis,' 'Degeneration,' 'Eternal Life,' and 'Classification,' to say nothing of the others in this volume, will fail to recognize in Mr Drummond a new and a powerful teacher, impressive both from the scientific calmness and accuracy of his view of law, and from the deep religious earnestness with which he traces the workings of law in the moral and spiritual sphere. . . . He attempts to show how the same laws which science has discovered in the phenomena of Nature continue, and can be traced, in the phenomena of the spiritual world; how such great principles as biogenesis,—the origination of life only out of what is already living,—not only by analogy, but identically, govern the course of spiritual, as they have been proved to govern that of natural, phenomena. He takes, therefore, some of the chief laws of nature as they have been discovered and stated by evolutionists, and demonstrates their identity with those principles of Christianity which have hitherto been accepted on authority, but have never been reduced to law or compared with the laws of nature. Biogenesis becomes in religion regeneration; spiritual death is want of correspondence; eternal life is perfect correspondence with the spiritual environment—God; conformity to type is conformity to the image of his Son."—Spectator, lvi. 997.

2. Tropical Africa. Maps and Illust. Lon., 1888, p. 8vo; 10th thousand same year.

"After the numerous and enormous volumes which have been written upon Africa, it is a genuine treat to find Professor Drummond going to the heart of his subject in a volume of a little over two hundred pages. . . . Its author is a remarkable writer as well as a remarkable thinker."—Spectator, lxi. 969.

Du Chaillu, Paul Belloni, b. 1835, in Louisiana; spent his early life in a French settlement at the mouth of the Gaboon River on the west coast of Africa, where his father was engaged in trade; from 1852 to 1855 lived in the United States; spent the greater part of the next four years in a journey of exploration in the Gaboon country, travelling on foot upwards of 8000 miles, and making a large collection of native arms and implements, as well as birds and quadrupeds which he had shot and stuffed, including gorillas and other species previously unknown or unclassified; returned to the United States in 1859, and subsequently went to England, where, in 1861, he published an account of his expedition, which became the subject of a vehement controversy at meetings of the Royal Geographical Society, and in the press; in 1864–65 he made another expedition through the same region, which, however, was cut short by the resistance of the natives; in 1872–73 he travelled extensively in Sweden and Norway, and he has recently revisited those countries. 1. "M. Du Chaillu's last journey was one series of misfortunes, succeeding each other with the most depressing monotony. . . . "His great merit lies in his fine descriptions of the scenery and physical characteristics of the country, and in his accurate and sympathetic account of the manners and customs of the peasantry. We think he is sometimes too lavish in his praise of these rude peoples; . . . but his pictures of their interiors, of their daily occupations, of their dances and weddings and other festive gatherings, and of their religious worship, are so true and life-like that we can easily forgive him for not having the heart to find fault with a race to which he became fondly attached. . . . Literature, history, science, and art do not come within the scope of his work."—Nation, xxxiii. 455.

"In spite of redundancy, repetition, and reiteration, these two volumes contain a great deal which disarms attack and merits consideration."—Sat. Rev., lii. 700.

"From a literary point of view the book is not without its faults; the dramatis personæ are sometimes made to speak and write in a stilted and sententious way, inconsistent with the character given of them. The author arrives in the country ignorant of the language, but very soon begins—in the book—to speak it. Probably the descriptions of places and events are not to be taken as strictly consecutive."—Ath., No. 2817.

"Her stories and essays combined tenderness and quiet humour, a close attention to detail, and a faculty of suggesting rather than describing emotion which gave her high rank in the school where Miss Thackeray is chief; while her poems, though at times striking deeper chords, had generally a rare union of playfulness and pathos, making her the best, if not the only, female writer of vers de société."—TOWNSHEND MAYER: Acad., Nov. 22, 1879.

Duff, Sir Mountstuart Elphinstone Grant-, G.C.S.I., C.I.E., F.R.S., b. 1829; son of the late James Cunninghame Grant-Duff, (q. v., ante, vol. i.;) educated at Edinburgh, and at Balliol College, Oxford; called to the bar at the Inner Temple 1854; M.P. for Elgin Burghs 1857–81. He was under-secretary of state for India 1868–74, and on the formation of Mr. Gladstone's second cabinet in 1880 he was appointed under-secretary of state for the colonies and sworn of the Privy Council. In 1881 he became governor of Madras, an office which he resigned in 1886. He was elected lord rector of Aberdeen University in 1867, and again in 1870. 1. "Mr. Dunphie is wholly genial in the range of his sympathies; he is delightfully unacademic; he is very observant; he is very reflective, and, like Charles Lamb, he can talk about himself in the quaintest of ways. His observation of nature is less elaborate than that of Jeffries or John Burroughs, but within its own limits and for its own quite different ends it is as satisfactory. But, fond as Mr. Dunphie is of nature, he is much fonder of people. The ways of men and women are really the favourite subjects of his half-humorous, half-pathetic studies."—Acad.

deputy collector at Buckergunge, Bengal. The Peasantry of Bengal: being a View of their Condition under the Hindu, Mahomedan, and English Rule, Calcutta and Lon., 1874, 12mo.

"The book is an emphatic protest on behalf of the oppressed ryot, and calls on the English government to face the evils it has created, and to make a permanent settlement on behalf of the ryot with the zemindar, to rectify the former one made on behalf of the zemindar by the state. . . . Romesh Chunder Dutt writes vigorous English."—J. I. MINCHIN: Acad., viii. 396.

Dutt, Shoshee Chunder, Rái Báhádar, a native of Lower Bengal, and member of a family belonging to the Kayast, a well-known writer caste. The first three works in the following list (which is probably incomplete) were published under the pseudonyme of "J. A. G. Barton": 1. Bengal: an Account of the Country and the Effects of British Rule, Lon., 1874, 12mo. 2. The Ancient World. Lon., 1875, 12mo. 3. The Modern World, Lon., 1876, 12mo. 4. 5. India, Past and Present: with Minor Essays on Cognate Subjects, Lon., 1880, 8vo.

"He writes sensibly and forcibly on matters with which his education and experience have made him competent to deal."—Sat. Rev., l. 428.

6. The Works of Shoshee Chunder Dutt, Lon., 1885, 6 vols.

Dutt, Toru, 1856–1877, youngest of the three daughters of Govin Chunder Dutt, a magistrate in his native province and a man of learning and cultivation, who survives them all. She made a very thorough study of the language and literature of France and of England, and in 1874 published a very full and learned essay on the writings of Leconte de Lisle, with translations into English verse. Having devoted herself to the study of Sanskrit, she translated the Vishnupurana into English blank verse. Meanwhile she was composing and translating poetry with extraordinary assiduity and apparently with equal ease in Hindustani, French, and English. She wrote also a romance in French, Le Journal de Mlle. d'Arvers, which was published in Paris, with a critical study by Mlle. Clarisse Bader, in 1879. She left some original poems in English, and other productions. 1. A Sheaf gleaned in French Fields, Bhowanipore, 1876; 2d ed., with a Prefatory Memoir by her Father, Lon., 1881, 8vo. (Contains English translations of about two hundred French poems, selected from the works of some of the least as well as the best known authors of the nineteenth century.)

"The 'Sheaf gleaned in French Fields' would have been an extraordinary feat had it been performed by an English lady of high education; from a Hindu girl it was little short of miraculous"—Sat. Rev., xlviii. 241.

"Books like this are sure to be cherished for the pathetic sweetness there is in them, to say nothing of latent intellectual stimulation."—Spectator, liv. 287.

2. Ancient Ballads and Legends of Hindustan: with an Introductory Memoir by Edmund W. Gosse, Lon., 1882, 12mo; new ed., 1885.

"Lovers of poetry will be grateful to Mr. Gosse for making them acquainted with her hitherto unpublished feats in English verse."—Sat. Rev., liii. 441.

Du Val, Charles, late of the carbineers, attaché to the staff of the garrison commandant, and editor of the News of the Camp during the investment of Pretoria. With a Show through Southern Africa, and Personal Reminiscences of the Transvaal War, Lon., 1882, 2 vols. 8vo; 2d ed., 1885.

"Mr. 'Mark Twain' has a great deal to answer for. Unlike Falstaff, though witty enough himself, (after the fashion of his country,) he has been the cause of very little wit in others. It is scarcely too much to say that had Mr. Du Val never read the 'New Pilgrim's Progress' he would have written a really interesting book of travels. . . . In the second part, in the author's personal reminiscences of the Boer campaign and the famous leagues of Pretoria, there is a great deal that is interesting, and not a little that is instructive."—*Sat. Dyer, Thomas Henry, LL.D., [ante, vol. i., add.,] 1804–1888, b. in London; was for some time a clerk in the West India House, and on the cessation of his duties consequent upon the Emancipation he devoted himself to literature. He travelled extensively in Europe, made a special study of the topography and antiquities of Greece and Italy, and contributed largely to Dr. Smith's dictionaries. 1. The History of Modern Europe, from the Fall of Constantinople in 1453 to the War in the Crimea in 1857, Lon., 1861–64, 4 vols. 8vo; new ed., with continuation to 1871, 1877, 5 vols. 8vo.

"Mr. Dyer means his work not as a book of reference, but as a book to be read. And in this point of view, as it is not a book of the highest order, it turns out almost of necessity a tiresome and not very profitable one."—Sat. Rev., xiii. 360.

"He seems to have no notion whatever of the Comparative method of dealing with any subject. . . . It does not seem to come into his head that Roman history is part of the general history of the world, and that light may be thrown upon it by other branches of history. . . . We can hardly think that Dr. Dyer is likely to win back many scholars to the ancient faith."—Sat. Rev., xxv. 657.

"As the work before us was the latest, so it was the most considerable and enduring product of John Eadie's fruitful pen. It manifestly embodies the results of many years of quiet study, in the course of which he must have found not a few of his own researches anticipated with the public by more brilliant or less patient writers. Indeed, we may safely conjecture that our modest author would scarcely have taken up the subject at all had Canon Westcott's masterly sketch of the self-same history appeared a few years earlier. But what the Scottish divine lacks of his rival's vigour and originality is amply compensated by minuteness of detail and rigid impartiality."—Sat. Rev., xliii. 770.

"The merits of the book, and they are great and many, lie in the details. . . . What Mr. Earle has to tell us about the history and usages of particular words and idioms is in almost every case happy. . . . 11. A Hand-Book to the Land Charters and other Saxonic Documents, Lon., 1888, cr. 8vo.

"An introduction of one hundred and eleven pages treats, first, of the forms of the charters, secondly, of social and land relations, and, thirdly, of the language of the documents. The second of these divisions possesses special interest for students of social history, and must be regarded as the most important contribution to this department of English history since the publication of Mr. Seebohm's treatise in 1883. Like Mr. Seebohm, Mr. Earle has advanced the discussion by a distinct step towards the solution of the problem; possibly he has solved it, but there still remain some considerations which he does not appear to have taken fully into account."—Nation, xlvii. 523.

". . . Besides the exhaustive treatment of the technicalities which the author undertakes to investigate, all that he has included . . . upon the style and value of the artists has that peculiar authority which belongs to the careful judgment of a painter upon his own profession."—Sat. Rev., xxvii. 463.

2. Contributions to the Literature of the Fine Arts. Second Series. With a Memoir compiled by Lady Eastlake. Lon., 1870, 8vo.

"Of his art no one has written more justly than his widow in the memoir, . . . which is one of the most admirable of short biographies."—Dict. of Nat. Biog., xvi. 332.

Eastlake, Charles Lock, F.R.I.B.A., nephew of Sir C. L. Eastlake, supra, b. at Plymouth; educated at Westminster School, where he gained a scholarship in 1846; studied architecture in the schools of the Royal Academy and on the Continent, but has not devoted himself to the active practice of the profession. He was secretary of the Royal Institute of British Architects from 1866 to 1878, and since then has been keeper and secretary of the National Gallery. His name has become literally a household word in connection with the revival of artistic styles of domestic furniture and decoration, which he was the first to advocate and introduce. He has contributed to periodicals and lectured to art institutions. 1. Hints on Household Taste in Furniture, Upholstery, and other Details, Lon., 1868, 8vo; 3d ed., rev., Lon., 1872; 4th ed., 1877; 6th Amer. ed., with Notes by C. C. Perkins, N. York, 1881.

"Its great value seems to us to consist in its simplicity and persuasiveness. Mr. Eastlake expresses what are the general, not to say universal, convictions among all who have paid much attention to practical art. There is no novelty in his remarks or criticisms. They are neither original nor very brilliant. But they are well timed, and very suggestive and instructive."—Sat. Rev., xxxv. 255.

2. A History of the Gothic Revival: an Attempt to show how the Taste for Mediæval Architecture which lingered in England during the Two Last Centuries has since been encouraged and developed, Lon., 1871, r. 8vo.

"Mr. Eastlake traces the history of what he calls the Gothic Revival with care, erudition, and discrimination, but in a somewhat laboured fashion."—Ath., No. 2314.

Eastlake, Elizabeth, Lady, [ante, vol. ii., RIGBY, MISS, add.,] b. about 1816; daughter of Edward Rigby, M.D., of Norwich, Eng.; married, 1849, to Mr. —afterwards Sir—C. L. Eastlake, supra. Her early works were reminiscences of a long visit to a sister who had married an Esthonian baron and settled on the shores of the Baltic. Lady Eastlake completed Mrs. Jameson's History of Our Lord in Works of Art, (Lon., 1863, 8vo.) She was also the author of the translation "by a lady" of Kugler's Hand-Book of Painting, edited by Sir C. L. Eastlake, which is mentioned under the latter's name, ante, vol. i. 1. Music, and The Art of Dress: Two Essays reprinted from the "Quarterly Review," Lon., 1852, 8vo. Anon. 2. (Ed.) Life of John Gibson, R.A., Sculptor, Lon., 1870, 8vo.

"This little biography is mainly due to two friends of the sculptor, Mrs. Henry Sandbach and Mr. Robert Hay, who at different times induced Gibson to narrate the simple facts of his life, and to give his opinions on matters connected with the art which he pursued with rare simplicity and devotion. . . . The fragments have been skilfully woven into a whole by Lady Eastlake."—Sat. Rev., xxix. 123.

(Contains photographs and other illustrations, a Persian translation of the poem, &c.)

"This is one of those gorgeous issues which are not offered for the hands of democracy. The edition has, we believe, been limited to one hundred and twenty copies, of which twenty have been reserved for the Supreme Government and Council of India, and of the remainder by far the greater number have been subscribed for by Native Princes of India. . . . We do not propose to criticise either the poetry or the politics of Mr. Eastwick's Imperial 'Lay.' Few men are so well acquainted with the history of India; still fewer are those who have a knowledge comparable with his of Eastern languages and Oriental life and manners."—ARTHUR ARNOLD: Acad., xv. 155.

Civil Service in Great Britain: a History of Abuses and Reforms, and their Bearing upon American Politics, N. York, 1879, 8vo.

"The greater part of the work is devoted . . . to showing how the spoils system in England grew out of the absolute ownership of offices by the crown, and was modified but not improved by the substitution of party government; and how, as its abuses became rank and intolerable, a rising spirit of public reprobation kept pace with them, till at last the sense and virtue of the English people overpowered the selfishness of a class and triumphed by the destruction of the system. The author makes skilful use of the occasions such a review presents for enforcing the need and the practicability of just such a national purgation among ourselves."—Nation, xxx. 46.

"Dr. Edersheim is a Hebrew Christian, who believes that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and all his Hebrew learning—which is great—is used strictly for the setting-forth of this great theme. . . . He has thrown light on many obscure points in the gospel history, and he has written the history of the time between the closing of the Old Testament and the opening of the New as it was never written before. . . . His strength lies in his wide and deep and accurate Jewish learning. The weakness of the book lies there also. It is overloaded with references to all kinds of Jewish topics."—Spectator, lvii. 286.

Edmundson, Rev. George, graduated at Magdalen College, Oxford, first class Math., 1870; Fellow of Brasenose College 1871–80, and tutor 1875–80; ordained 1872; vicar of Northolt, Middlesex, since 1881. Milton and Vondel: a Curiosity of Literature, Lon., 1885, p. 8vo.

"The inquiry to which the author has here devoted far more attention than it has hitherto received is not altogether new. For a century and a half the critics have recognized in Milton an assimilative instinct, over which his mental constitution did not enable him to exercise much control. It was a perfectly natural instinct with him; it invigorated his poetic capacity, and stands in no need of excuse or defence. . . . Of later years the Dutch poet Vondel has been regarded by his countrymen as Milton's chief creditor. . . . The only English writer before Mr. Edmundson who has thought it worth while to bring any exact knowledge to a discussion of it is Mr. Edmund Gosse. ["Studies in the Literature of Northern Europe."] Mr. Edmundson has extended the area of the inquiry thus begun."—Ath., No. 3028.

Edwardes, Maj.-Gen. Sir Herbert Benjamin, K.C.B., K.C.S.I., D.C.L., &c., [ante, vol. i., add.,] 1819–1868; rendered important services throughout the Indian Mutiny as commissioner of Peshawur. (The first volume is wholly by Sir H. B. E.)

"The correspondence is well selected and well woven together; the character is drawn without adulation and without concealment of those imperfections which do not, after all, impair its high worth and dignity; and the result is that we have a valuable addition to that mass of biographical literature which conveys more sound and practical teaching than volumes of homilies and sermons. . . . The story of such a life and death, of difficulties so manfully encountered, of earnestness at the last so tempered with charity, and of duty so nobly performed, may well be read with advantage by young Englishmen of every class and profession."—Sat. Rev., xxxiii. 665, 701.

"The vexatiousness of Sir Herbert Edwardes's style, its prosiness, and its exaggeration, hinder the real interest of the first volume from making itself felt. . . . Mr. Merivale has made admirable use of the immense and troublesome quantity of materials placed at his disposal for the compilation of the second volume, the whole narrative portion of which is his own. It is a model of all a biography ought to be, in taste, in discretion, in feeling, and in arrangement."—Spectator, xlv. 1174.

Edwards, Miss Amelia Blandford, b. 1831, is the daughter of an English officer. She began to write for periodicals in 1853, and has contributed largely on literary, political, and artistic topics to English reviews and newspapers. Since 1880 she has devoted herself chiefly to Egyptological subjects; she is honorary secretary of the Egypt Exploration Fund, and a contributor on Egyptology to the ninth edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica. She is also a member of the Biblical Archæological Society and of the Society for the Promotion of Hellenic Studies, and a vice-president of the West of England National Society for Woman's Suffrage. "'A Thousand Miles up the Nile' is far from being a mere book of travel, though it is enlivened with the incidental narratives and picturesque descriptions customary in such a volume. . . . The style of the whole book is marked by precision and sustained vigour. . . . All the attractive and popular qualities which I have enumerated are placed by the author at the service of a strong and ardent passion for Egyptian archæology. . . . It is this enthusiasm for old Egypt, running powerful and deep throughout the volume as an undercurrent to its many other interests, that gives its real charm to the work."—J. A. "Mr. Eggleston's stories have held from the beginning a great popularity with a large circle of readers, and it has been in many ways well deserved. They are full of incident: all of these rapid events occur amid scenes almost entirely new to the Eastern reader and the new generation of Westerners; and they have in a high degree the element of dialectic speech, which . . . confers upon the personages of the story that appearance of reality and individuality for which the novel-writer has to watch so keenly and work so hard."—Nation, xix. 207.

"If we feel that we could sometimes have spared some of the copious learning which Mr. Ellis brings to bear on his subject, our general feeling is one of the most genuine admiration. Its variety and plenty is such as it is difficult to describe. One peculiarity of it is that it passes, for the most part, the more familiar authors, to deal with those who are strange even to the well-read scholars of the ordinary stamp. He has drawn, he says in his preface, his parallel citations and illustrations 'from the predecessors or contemporaries rather than from the followers of Catullus; from the less hackneyed writers, such as Plautus, Lucilius, Varro, rather than from such as have become insipid by familiarity; from Greek preferably to Latin.' It is difficult to describe how consistently this has been done. It is not too much to say that most scholars will often find themselves introduced to an almost unknown world of ancient literature by this 'Commentary.'" Spectator, l. 568.

Emerson, Ralph Waldo, [ante, vol. i., add.,] 1803–1882, b. in Boston, Mass.; was educated at the Boston Latin School, and at Harvard College. After graduating in 1821, he taught school for three years, attended lectures at the Cambridge Divinity School, entered the Unitarian ministry, and in 1829 became the colleague of Henry Ware at the Second Church in Boston. In 1832 he resigned his charge, announcing the scruples which led him to do so in a sermon on "The Lord's Supper," afterwards published among his works. He continued, however, to preach occasionally in Unitarian pulpits for several years. In 1833 he went to Europe, visited Italy, Sicily, and France, spent some time in England, and paid a visit to Carlyle at Craigenputtock. In 1835 he settled at Concord, Mass. He delivered courses of lectures in Boston during several successive winters; founded in 1836 the society which acquired the name of the Transcendental Club, and was a contributor to The Dial during its brief existence, 1840–44, and for two years its editor. In 1847 he revisited England, lecturing in Manchester, London, and other towns, and in 1848 he made an excursion to Paris. On the establishment of the Atlantic Monthly in 1857 he became a contributor, and many of his poems were published in its pages. In the years before and during the civil war he lectured on the questions involved in the conflict. In 1872 his house at Concord was partially destroyed by fire. It was rebuilt by his friends, and he paid a third visit to Europe, remaining abroad about a year. He lectured occasionally till 1876, but in the last years of his life his memory became much impaired. In 1881 he read a paper on Carlyle before the Massachusetts Historical Society. "The first eight volumes of the present edition of Mr. Emerson's writings contain his collected Essays as he left them, except some revision of the punctuation and the correction of obvious mistakes. The ninth volume comprises the pieces chosen by Mr. Emerson from the 'Poems' and 'May-Day' to form the 'Selected Poems,' with the addition of some poems which were omitted in that selection, and some that have remained unpublished. In many instances emendations which were pencilled in the margin by Mr. Emerson, but were not adopted in the 'Selected Poems,' are now introduced, upon the ground that, as they seem to have suggested themselves at the time when his powers were in their fullest vigor, it may fairly be supposed that he would, upon reconsideration, have admitted them. The tenth and eleventh volumes consist of lectures hitherto unprinted, and of 'Occasional Addresses' and other prose writings which have appeared separately or in periodicals."—*Prefatory Note by J. GENERAL CRITICISM:

"His work is not of the stuff that one can clip scarlet patches from. The matter and the form are inseparable, as one finds them in the best talk. . . . He produces the effect of conversation rather than of literature; his thoughts are spoken out for the stirring of kindred thought rather than written down for learning."—Sat. Rev., xli. 275.

"It is just in the combination of an ideal height and range of thought with balance and sanity that we find Emerson's charm. He constantly teaches us in his informal way, as Berkeley taught us with classical English and philosophy, that idealism is nothing else than common sense transfigured and enthroned above sophistry."—Sat. Rev., lvii. 118.

"More than any of the other great writers of the age, he is a Voice. He is almost impersonal. He is pure from the taint of sect, clique, or party. He does not argue, but announces; he speaks when the Spirit moves him, but not longer. Better than any contemporary, he exhibits the might of the spoken word. He helps us to understand the enigma how Confucius and Buddha and Socrates and greater teachers still should have produced such marvellous effects by mere oral utterance."—RICHARD GARNETT: Life of Emerson, ("Great Writers,") 188.

"Look through all Emerson's writings, and then consider whether in all literature you can find a man who has better fulfilled that aspiration stated in such condensed words by Joubert, 'to put a whole book into a page, a whole page into a phrase, and that phrase into a word.' . . . And if you say that, nevertheless, this is nothing so long as an author has not given us a system of the universe, it can only be said that Emerson never desired to do this, but left on record the opinion that 'it is too young by some ages yet to form a creed.' The system-makers have their place, no doubt; but, when we consider how many of them have risen and fallen since Emerson began to write,—Coleridge, Schelling, Cousin, Comte, Mill, and so on, down to the Hegel of yesterday and the Spencer of to-day,—it is really evident that the absence of a system cannot prove much more short-lived than the possession of that commodity. It must be left for future generations to determine Emerson's precise position even as a poet. There is seen in him the tantalizing combination of the profoundest thoughts with the greatest possible variation in artistic work,—sometimes mere boldness and almost waywardness, while at other times he achieves the most exquisite melody touched with a certain wild grace. He has been likened to an æolian harp, which now gives and then perversely withholds its music."—Nation, xxxiv. 376.

"Emerson's place as a thinker is somewhat difficult to fix. He cannot properly be called a psychologist. He made notes and even delivered lectures on the natural history of the intellect; but they seem to have been made up, according to his own statement, of hints and fragments rather than of the results of systematic study. He was a man of intuition, of insight, a seer, a poet, with a tendency to mysticism. This tendency renders him sometimes obscure, and once in a while almost, if not quite, unintelligible. . . . But that which is mysticism to a dull listener may be the highest and most inspiring imaginative clairvoyance to a brighter one. . . . Too much has been made of Emerson's mysticism. He was an intellectual rather than an emotional mystic, and withal a cautious one. He never let go the string of his balloon. He never threw over all his ballast of common sense so as to rise above an atmosphere in which a rational being could breathe."—OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES: Life of Emerson, 390, 396.

"We have not in Emerson a great poet, a great writer, a great philosophy-maker. His relation to us is not that of one of those personages; yet it is a relation of, I think, even superior importance. His relation to us is more like that of the Roman Emperor Marcus Aurelius. Marcus Aurelius is not a great writer, a great philosophy-maker; he is the friend and aider of those who would live in the spirit. Emerson is the same. He is the friend and aider of those who would live in the spirit. All the points in thinking which are necessary for this purpose he takes; but he does not combine them into a system or present them as a regular philosophy. Combined in a system by a man with the requisite talent for this kind of thing, they would be less useful than as Emerson gives them to us; and the man with the talent so to systematize them would be less impressive than Emerson. They do very well as they now stand,—like 'boulders,' as he says,—in 'paragraphs incompressible, each sentence an infinitely repellent particle.' In such sentences his main points recur again and again, and become fixed in the memory. . . . Yes, truly, his insight is admirable; his truth is precious. Yet the secret of his effect is not even in these: it is in his temper. It is in the hopeful, serene, beautiful temper wherewith these, in Emerson, are indissolubly joined; in which they work and have their being."—MATTHEW ARNOLD: Discourses in America, 178–180, 193.

"Amid the utter delirium-disease called book making, . . . how comforting to know of an author who has, through a long life, and in spirit, written as honestly, spontaneously, and innocently as the sun shines or the wheat grows—the truest, sanest, most moral, sweetest literary man on record—unspoiled by pecuniary or any other warp—ever teaching the law within—ever loyally outcropping his own self only—his own poetic and devout soul!"—WALT WHITMAN: Critic, i. 331.

"He is always interesting and instructive when he deals with the working and the mechanism of institutions, as banks, mills, newspaper-offices, and when he describes rare or unfamiliar classes of people,—dukes, ditchers, and mayors. . . . The chapters on more familiar topics are less important and less attractive."—Sat. Rev., xlviii. 605.

"The book is a summary, a series of photographs or illustrations of the work done and the life led by the various sections of the population of England at the present day. It is the counterfeit presentment of the English people in its many manifestations. The summary is presented with considerable attention to literary form, and occasional considerable success in literary style. . . . There is no great pretence to originality in view, or great philosophic or historical insight. . . . In regard to matters of fact remarkable accuracy is shown."—Spectator, lviii. 584.

"The author's main object is to give a complete list of the vocabulary of Welsh literature, and to fix the meaning of the words given by reference to the passages where they occur. The etymological remarks in it are reduced within narrow limits, which I think is, on the whole, wise and prudent, since it is early as yet to attempt to treat of the origin of Welsh words in anything like an exhaustive manner. . . . In the mean while, Mr. Silvan Evans pursues with vigour and precision a work to which his whole life has been devoted, and one for which he is the fittest man living."—J. RHYS: Acad., xxxii. 222.

"The few pages of Mr. Evans's introductory notice prepare the reader for finding, in this work of an anonymous biographer, matter of real 'value and interest as a document illustrating the history of England in the seventeenth century.' The editor has faithfully carried out his purpose of presenting the 'manuscript, which came into his possession about fifty years ago,' exactly as it stands, with all its characteristic faults of spelling, style, and composition, and the result is in most lively contrast with certain modern attempts at biographical representations of the style of two hundred years ago."—*Sat. Eyton, Rev. Robert William, M.A., [ante, vol. i., add.,] 1815–1881, son of Rev. John Eyton, (q. v., ante, vol. i.,) b. at Wellington, Shropshire; graduated with honors at Christ Church, Oxford, 1839; was rector of Ryton from 1841 till 1863, when he resigned his living on account of failing health and removed to the south of England. He sold his library, intending to give up literary work, but afterwards continued his researches, and published, in addition to the work mentioned ante, vol. i.: 1. A Key to Domesday: showing the Method and Exactitude of its more usual Formulæ: exemplified by an Analysis and Digest of the Dorset Survey, Lon., 1879, 4to. 2. The Court, Household, and Itinerary of King Henry II., &c., Lon., 1879, 4to.

"That consummate antiquary, Mr. R. W. Eyton, . . . has produced two quarto volumes of singular interest and importance to students of Domesday and of the eventful reign of Henry II. . . . It is to be feared, however, that the scholarship and learning displayed on every page of these two volumes will command less attention than they deserve, from the unattractive form in which they are presented to the reader."—E. C. WATERS: Acad., xvi. 275.

"It is meant for those who take a sufficient interest in mediæval history to be at the pains of studying it for themselves, and who demand a guide to lead them in their own researches, and a storehouse of facts on which to base their own deductions."—Ath., No. 2686.

Eyton, Thomas Campbell, F.L.S., F.Z.S., [ante, vol. i., EYTON, T. C., add.,] 1809–1880, b. at Eyton, Shropshire; succeeded to the family estate in 1855, and built a museum at Eyton containing one of the finest collections of birds in Europe. He was a friend and correspondent of Darwin and other naturalists, and his observations on the habits of pigeons were used as materials by Darwin, much to his chagrin, as he was not a believer in the theory of natural selection. He edited the Herd-Book of Hereford Cattle, mentioned ante, vol. i., 1842–60, and published, in addition to works mentioned there: 1. A History of the Oyster and Oyster-Fisheries, Lon., 1861, 8vo. 2. Osteologia Avium; or, A Sketch of the Osteology of Birds: with Two Supplements, 1869–79, 3 vols. 4to; the whole in 1 vol., 1881. 3. It was translated into all the chief European languages, and a dramatized version by the author and Mr. Comyns Carr was very successful on the stage.)

"It is clear enough that Mr. Fargus has a very bright imagination for what may be called sensational incident, and that when he has got hold of a sensational incident he narrates it with much freshness and vigour. 'Called Back' is a most improbable tale, but the truth is that all tales which depend for their interest on plot alone ought to be in some sense improbable."—Spectator, lvii. 822.

"Mr. Farrar's object is 'to enter briefly into the causes, moral and intellectual, of the present wide-spread defection from the faith which our fathers held; to show that neither Philosophy nor Criticism has shaken one truth of Christianity; to show the extent and glory of its individual, social, and political victories; and thus to demonstrate the mighty Witness borne by History to the Faith of Christ.' . . . These Lectures will be read with interest by many who are no controversialists, while the numerous notes will furnish students with valuable references, and convince them of the trustworthiness of the guide who is here pointing out a path for them."—Ath., No. 2289.

"Dr. Farrar is familiar with the scenes and the customs of Palestine and its inhabitants, from his personal observation as well as from the accounts of other travellers; he is acquainted—as his notes constantly show—with all the authorities, ancient and modern, orthodox and rationalist, whose names he arrays in a long list; he is devoutly Christian in his faith; moderate and liberal after the manner of our English Church divines; desirous 'to aid the cause of truth and righteousness' by what he writes; and with these qualifications, intellectual, moral, and religious, he pours forth the torrents of rhetoric which form these two volumes. . . . The words are too big for his thoughts, and the poverty of the fancies is not concealed by the tinsel epithets with which they are tricked out."—Spectator, xlvii. 886.

"They seem to us to exhibit all the faults of his earlier efforts in an exaggerated form, without possessing some of the qualities which helped to atone for them. The style, in particular,—never a strong point with our author,—is unlikely to satisfy even his ardent admirers, fluctuating as it does between turgid rhetoric and a tone of jaunty familiarity better suited to the columns of the American daily press. . . . There can be no question as to the value and importance of his labours, if only they approximate to his ideal standard; and it is because, in our judgment, they fail to do so that we can accept them with but qualified approval."—Sat. Rev., xlviii. 603.

"The success which his work has met with is easily understood. There is the charm of a refined rhetorical style, not too heavily freighted with thought. The reader floats easily and lazily along, past all the whirlpools of modern criticism, and without a jar arrives at the destined conclusion. The flavour of learning of a vast and multitudinous kind is presented. There is everywhere a studied reverence and a careful setting forth of conclusions precious to the hearts of thousands, and great care is taken to keep the dry details of history out of view. . . . We get little help from Canon Farrar to the solution of the many critical problems which have arisen in recent years in relation to the Epistles of Paul and to the Acts of the Apostles. . . . The reader of these volumes might read them through without becoming aware of the weighty controversies which are now agitating the Churches on these questions. . . . It is, however, true that readers of this book will gain a more vivid conception of the moral, social, and religious condition of the world when Christianity went forth for the regeneration of the nations. . . . Canon Farrar has largely succeeded in setting forth the outward circumstances, the social forces, the special training, which moulded the character of Paul. . . . His large acquaintance with the Jewish literature outside of and beyond the sacred books, and his profuse citation of relevant passages, often throw a flood of light on obscure passages in the life of Paul and on difficult passages in his writings, while the description he gives of the great controversy of the early Church, and of the intense bitterness which marked that contest, is characterized both by fulness of information and accuracy of statement."—Spectator, lii. 1349.

"There is enough of matter, some of it indeed very disputable matter, in Canon Farrar's new book, to engage the attention of readers who care more for the substance than the outward form when the questions at issue are both interesting and important. . . . It is not a great work, but it is not a literary failure, as we hold that the 'Life of St. Paul' was."—Sat. Rev., liv. 638.

"Archdeacon Farrar has a very definite theory to account for all the errors of interpreters, which he traces to their faith in verbal inspiration; but whether his theory is accepted or not, he has given his readers ample opportunities of judging for themselves. "Fawcett, George," (Pseud.) See Fawcett, Miss Sophia Alice, infra.

Fawcett, Henry, LL.D., D.C.L., 1833–1884, b. at Salisbury, Eng.; was educated at Queenwood College, Hampshire, King's College School, London, and Trinity Hall, Cambridge, where he graduated in 1856 and was elected a Fellow. In 1858 he was deprived of sight by an accident, but in the next year returned to the university, where he took his M.A. degree and in 1863 was elected professor of political economy. He was elected M.P. for Brighton in 1865, and continued to represent that constituency till 1874, when he lost his seat in the general election, but two months later was returned for Hackney. In 1880 he became postmaster-general, and in 1883 was elected lord rector of Glasgow University. For biog., see Stephen, Leslie, infra. 1. "In the present edition Mr. Fawcett has added two chapters. . . . They do not, any more than the rest of the book, make any claims to originality. . . . But they are a very forcible and compressed statement of certain truths which, familiar as they ought to be, are neglected almost in proportion to their importance."—*Sat. "The doctrines which he preaches have at least the merits of simplicity and consistency. He has told us constantly that, whilst the rich are growing richer, the poor, if not growing poorer, are certainly not making any corresponding advance. He has given us his remedies, which consist principally in a compulsory system of education, and in the general adoption of the co-operative system in manufactures and agriculture. . . . His book is thoroughly honest, and honest in the sense of speaking unpalatable truth to the working-classes."—Sat. Rev., xxxi. 503.

"The main remedy for this vast evil which presents itself to Mr. Fawcett's mind seems to us utterly futile,—that is, the diffusion through the laboring classes of a sense of their duty to check population."—Nation, xiii. 10.

"Mr. Fawcett discusses various questions connected with pauperism, and explains what is in his view the right thing to be done with the House of Lords. Mrs. Fawcett dilates on the wrongs of women, and moreover sets forth, with the zeal of a thorough-going disciple, the merits of Mr. Hare's scheme of representation . . . Perhaps both Mr. and Mrs. Fawcett are a little too certain of their own infallibility, and too much convinced that the very last word upon political and philosophical questions has been said by Mr. Mill and Mr. Herbert Spencer."—*Sat. "It reads like a novel, and, although the author chiefly dwells on her musical experiences in conservatories and concert-halls, there is yet enough extraneous description of opera balls, soldiers, social affairs, &c., to do away with all sense of monotony. "Mr. Featherman has set himself a long and laborious task. To digest from the travellers' tales of the last two centuries, the reports of missionaries, and the more formal observations of recent explorers, all that can be ascertained of the social life of every tribe of the many races of mankind; to reconcile the contradictions of these various authorities; and to discriminate where prejudice or credulity may have led them wrong, are undertakings that demand a vast expenditure of time, a great accumulation of knowledge, and some critical acumen. Mr. Featherman is well equipped in these respects. He justly repudiates the faint praise that would damn him as a mere collector of facts and give him credit for nothing but industry in collecting them. He claims that he is writing, on the basis of facts collected from original authorities, a history of the peoples in their social capacity, including their manners and customs, their government, their religion, their superstitions, and their literary, artistic, and scientific advancement. He is, at any rate, engaged on a work which is such a storehouse of facts as the student of comparative sociology will not meet with elsewhere, arranged with simplicity and clearness."—Ath., No. 3125.

Ferguson, Robert M. Electricity, Edin., 1866, 12mo; new ed., rev. and extended by J. Blyth, 1882.

Ferguson, Sir Samuel, Q.C., LL.D., 1810–1886, b. in Belfast, Ireland; graduated at Trinity College, Dublin, 1826; was called to the Irish bar in 1838, and made Queen's counsel in 1859. In 1867 he was appointed the first deputy keeper of the public records in Ireland, in recognition of his eminent service to Irish antiquities, and showed great ability in organizing the records department, for which he was knighted in 1878. He was elected president of the Royal Irish Academy in 1882. One of his early poems, The Forging of the Anchor, was introduced to the readers of Blackwood's Magazine by Christopher North, who, in his Noctes Ambrosianæ, gave it warm praise and predicted success for the writer. He contributed translations from the Irish, as well as poems and tales, to the Dublin University Magazine and other periodicals, and many papers on Irish antiquities to the Transactions of the Royal Irish Academy. 1. Lays of the Western Gael, and other Poems, Lon., 1864, 12mo; new ed., 1888. 2. The Cromlech on Howth: a Poem: with Illuminations from the Books of Kells and of Durrow, and Drawings from Nature by M. S., [Miss M. M. Stokes:] with Notes on Celtic Ornamental Art, revised by G. Petrie, Lon., 1864, 4to. 3. Father Tom and the Pope; or, A Night at the Vatican: as related by Mr. Michael Heffernan, Master of the National School at Tullymactaggart in the County of Leitrim, N. York, 1868. (This was originally published in Blackwood's Magazine, and, with other contributions of the author, was reprinted in Tales from Blackwood's, first series, vols. iii., vii., viii., xii.) 4. Congal: a Poem, in Five Books, Lon., 1872, 4to. 5. Poems, Lon., 1880, 8vo. 6. Shakspearean Breviates: Adjustment of Longer Plays, Lon., 1882, p. 8vo. 7. The Forging of the Anchor: a Poem. Illust. Lon., 1883, 4to. 8. Hibernian Nights' Entertainments, Lon., 1887, three series, 12mo. 9. Ogham Inscriptions in Ireland, Wales, and Scotland. Edited by Lady Ferguson. Edin., 1887, 8vo.

"As a poet he deserves recollection in Ireland, for he strove hard to create modern poetry from the old Irish tales of heroes and saints and histories of places. . . . While sometimes giving the stories more beauties than he takes away, he misses something of the reality of ancient life. . . . Several of the poems of his own experience are admirable."—Dict. of Nat. Biog., xviii. 356.

Fergusson, Lieut.-Col. Alexander, b. at Rotchell, Kirkcudbrightshire, Scotland; educated at Edinburgh Academy; entered the military service of the East India Company in 1848; served through the campaign in Persia 1856-57, and in the Indian Mutiny, and afterwards on the staff; retired 1869. He has contributed to the Athenæum, &c. 1. Life of the Honourable Henry Erskine, Lord-Advocate for Scotland: with Notices of certain of his Kinsfolk and of his Time, Lon., 1882, 8vo.

"An abundant supply of Henry Erskine's many good sayings is given by Colonel Fergusson, and they are sprinkled among the rest of the contents of his volume in an agreeable manner."—Sat. Rev., liv. 254.

"An excellent contribution to the history of Scottish life and humour."—Ath., No. 285.

2. (Ed.) Letters and Journals of Mrs. Margaret Calderwood of Polton, from England, Holland, and the Low Countries, in 1756, Edin., 1884, 8vo.

"Col. Fergusson's present volume is little inferior in interest to 'Henry Erskine and his Kinsfolk.' Mrs. Calderwood, a Steuart of Goodtrees, was aunt of the great advocate and of Lord Chancellor Erskine, and also, through his Dalrymple ancestry, a great-niece of the 'Bride of Lammermoor.' . . . Both in powers of observation and graphic narrative Mrs. Calderwood must take a high rank among letter-writers."—Ath., No. 2984.

3. The Laird of Lag: a Life-Sketch of Sir Robert Grierson. Illust. Edin., 1885, 8vo.

"Colonel Fergusson . . . has now undertaken to sketch the pedigree, life, and times of Sir Robert Grierson of Lag, who is believed to have been the original of Redgauntlet or of Herries of Birrenswork."—Sat. Rev., lxi. 512.

"The work forms an interesting contribution to our knowledge of a period of Scottish history upon which recent research has thrown much new light."—Acad., xxix. 213.

4. Chronicles of the Cumming Club and Memories of Old Academy Days, 1841–1846, Edin., 1887, 8vo. (The "Cumming Club" was so named from Dr. James Cumming, a teacher in the Edinburgh Academy, of whom the members had been pupils. It comprised many distinguished Scotchmen, such as Henry Erskine, Henry Cockburn, Andrew Wilson, and others.)

"The book may be heartily recommended to all who care for manhood, warm human kindness, and genuine fun."—Ath., No. 3137.

5. (Ed.) Major Fraser's Manuscript: his Adventures in Scotland and England; his Mission to and Travels in France; his Services in the Rebellion (and his Quarrels) with Simon Fraser, Lord Lovat, 1696–1737, Edin., 1888, 2 vols. fp. 8vo.

"The many side-lights which the narrative throws upon the characters of noted people, the picture which it draws of the wild lawlessness reigning unchecked in the Northern Highland before 'the '15, and its curious description of the relations existing between the chief of the Fraser clan and its immediate adherents, . . . render it a far more important work than a reader is at first tempted to imagine."—Ath., No. 3208.

Fergusson, James, [ante, vol. i., add.,] 1808–1886, b. at Ayr, Scotland, son of William Fergusson, M.D., (q. v., ante, vol. i.;) went to India at an early age and started an indigo-factory. Ten years later he retired from business, and, having settled in London, devoted himself to archæological research. He was a member of the Royal Asiatic Society and a frequent contributor to its Proceedings. His theories in regard to the site of the Holy Sepulchre and the Temple of Jerusalem, &c., led to the establishment of the Palestine Exploration Fund; but they have not found favor with later explorers. In 1871 he was awarded the gold medal of the Institute of British Architects. 1. The Peril of Portsmouth; or, French Fleets and English Ports, Lon., 1852, 8vo; 3d ed., 1853. 2. The Illustrated Hand-Book of Architecture: being a Concise and Popular Account of the Different Styles of Architecture prevailing in All Ages and Countries, Lon., 1855, 2 vols. 8vo; 2d ed., 1859. 3. Portsmouth Protected: a Sequel to "The Peril of Portsmouth," Lon., 1856, 8vo. 4. Notes on the Site of the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem, Lon., 1861, 8vo. 5. The Mausoleum at Halicarnassus restored, Lon., 1862, 4to. 6. A History of the Modern Styles of Architecture: being a Sequel to the "Hand-Book of Architecture," Lon., 1862, 8vo. (This was subsequently incorporated in the History of Architecture mentioned below.) 7. The Rock-Cut Temples of India: illustrated by Seventy-Four Photographs taken on the Spot by Major Gill, Lon., 1864, 8vo.

"This is a most beautiful book, and if its letter-press were but equal, in elegance and scholarship, to the perfection of Messrs. Clay's typography and the interest of Major Gill's photographs, there would be nothing left to be desired."—Sat. Rev., xvii. 174.

8. The Holy Sepulchre and the Temple at Jerusalem, Lon., 1865, 8vo. (See Warren, Capt. Charles, infra.) 9. History of Architecture in All Countries, from the Earliest Times to the Present Day, Lon., 1865–67, 3 vols. 8vo; 2d ed., 1873–76, 4 vols.

"Mr. Fergusson's beautiful and most popular books have superseded all other Histories of Architecture."—Sat. Rev., xxiii. 415.

10. On the Study of Indian Architecture: read at a Meeting of the Society of Arts: with a Report of the Discussion which ensued, Lon., 1867, 8vo. 11. Tree and Serpent Worship; or, Illustrations of Mythology and Art in India in the First and Fourth Centuries after Christ; from the Sculptures of the Buddhist Topes at Sanchi and Amravati: with Introductory Essay and Descriptions of the Plates: prepared under the Authority of the Secretary of State for India in Council, Lon., 1868, 4to; 2d ed., rev., 1873. (Contains fifty-nine photographs and forty-two lithographs.)

"The careful and indefatigable collection of facts which is shown in all his writings is conspicuous throughout the present volume, and the study he has brought to bear upon the elucidation of the monumental remains which form its professed object, and should justify its outlay, is beyond all praise. . . . The tale of the monuments of Sanchi and Amravati has been kept in subordination to certain speculations, not to say dogmas, of an ethnographical or a theosophic character, which have become fixed ideas in the writer's mind. . . . Yet we feel, for our part, too much beholden for the artistic treat which the second and substantial portion of the volume has afforded us, to find undue fault with what we may think shadowy and conjectural in the preliminary matter."—Sat. Rev., xxvii. 356.

12. Rude Stone Monuments in All Countries. Illust. Lon., 1872, 8vo. 13. A Short Essay on the Age and Uses of the Brochs and the Rude Stone Monuments of the Orkney Islands and the North of Scotland, Lon., 1877, 8vo. 14. The Temples of the Jews, and other Buildings in the Haram Area at Jerusalem, Lon., 1878, 4to.

"As an architectural work it abounds with critical knowledge, and shows keen powers of discrimination. . . . In matters of historical or literary criticism we find him claiming an amount of infallibility such as no expert can be allowed to set up even in his own province of knowledge."—Sat. Rev., xlv. 598.

"Certainly it appears from the mass of evidence here carefully weighed that Mr. Fergusson's theory of the sites is the most firmly grounded of any; nevertheless, it has been and will be strenuously opposed by very great numbers, including most of our clergy."—Spectator, li. 476.

15. The Parthenon: an Essay on the Mode by which Light was introduced into Greek and Roman Temples. Illust. Lon., 1883, 4to.

"The main object of Mr. Fergusson's work—on which he has expended much study both of historical evidence and of the buildings themselves, aided in no small degree by his practical knowledge of architecture—is to combat the old and once universally accepted theory of the 'hole-in-the-roof' (hypæthrum) method of lighting the cella."—Acad., xxiv. 32.

"Amiable and well-intentioned as he evidently is, the intellectual aspect of his work, with all its learning and impartiality, is that of an able and conscientious attempt to establish a paradox. . . . In spite, however, of these grave objections to the theory upon which it is built, the history which Mr. Ffoulkes tells is the history of one of the greatest events in the annals of Christendom, and we must own that it is told well."—*Sat. Memories of Many Men and of Some Women: being Personal Recollections of Emperors, Kings, Queens, Princes, Presidents, Statesmen, Authors, and Artists, at Home and Abroad, during the Last Thirty Years, N. York and Lon., 1874, p. 8vo.

"The book is written in the easy, natural style of an educated man who is fond of gossip, fond of politics, and not too much troubled by general ideas to take an interest in any details of personal history which relate to the career of those about whom the world is fond of gossiping and hearing gossip."—Nation, xviii. 108.

"One of those rare volumes which, copious as is the promise that is made on the title-page, does much more than keep it. . . . He is perfectly at home with all whom he encounters, from emperors to artists, and his reminiscences of the one are as amusing as those of the other."—Ath., No. 2414.

"Field, Michael," pseudonyme of an English female writer. All her productions are dramas in blank verse. 1. Callirrhoë; Fair Rosamond, Lon, 1884.

"These poems are poems of great promise. We know nothing of the author; but we have found a wealth of surprises in the strength, the simplicity, and the terseness of the imaginative feeling they display, that convinces us of his power to do much more than he has done,—though even that is no trivial beginning."—Spectator, lvii. 680.

Fields, James Thomas, LL.D., [ante, vol. i., add.,] 1816–1881, b. at Portsmouth, N.H.; removed to Boston in 1834; became a partner in the firm of William D. Ticknor & Co. in 1845, and in 1854 head of the firm, which became subsequently that of Fields & Osgood, and was for many years the most prominent publishing house in America in the department of belles-lettres, a position for which it was chiefly indebted to Mr. Fields's intimate relations with leading authors on both sides of the Atlantic. He was editor of the Atlantic Monthly from 1862 to 1870, when he retired from business. He was also well known as a lecturer. For biog., see Fields, Annie, supra. 1. "There is some insignificant gossip, but there are many people who enjoy gossip about men of mark. . . . Nor, except in one instance, [Hawthorne,] would the authors themselves, perhaps, greatly resent Mr. Fields's treatment of them. . . . When, however, we have struck out the passages which will give pain, and which should never have been published, there is much that is both interesting and important."—Ath., No. 2317.

"Finlay is a great historian, of the type of Polybius, Procopius, and Machiavelli, a man of affairs, who has qualified himself for treating of public transactions by sharing in them, a soldier, a statesman, and an economist. He is not picturesque or eloquent, or a master of the delineation of character, but a singular charm attaches to his pages from the perpetual consciousness of contact with a vigorous intelligence."—RICHARD GARNETT: Dict. of Nat. Biog., xix. 31.

"His observations on the resources and characteristics of Western America bear the imprint of a mature judgment and a keen eye. . . . There is very little personal narrative, the chapters being mainly occupied with condensed notes on the different features of the country visited, as they struck a colonist writing for colonists. . . . They describe America not, as is usually the case, from the European point of view, but from that of regions in a similar case."—ROBERT BROWN: Acad., xxxiv. 216.

9. The History of the Christian Church. Maps. N. York, 1887, 8vo.

"It was a bold undertaking to present so vast a subject in the compass of a single volume of moderate size. . . . Professor Fisher's previous works have shown that he possesses the wide acquirements requisite to the undertaking, and the clearness of exposition necessary to render his knowledge available. Yet we cannot but regret that he should not have allowed himself a broader canvas on which to depict the infinite details that crowd each other in the presentation. . . . The whole work is informed with a reverent and believing spirit."—Nation, xlv. 463.

Two Sermons: with Notes referring to the Present Crisis, Lon., 1850, 8vo. 2. Physics of the Earth's Crust, Lon., 1882, 8vo; 2d ed., enl., 1889.

"Although many of the subjects discussed by Mr. Fisher must remain open questions until we are far better acquainted with the conditions of volcanic action, we think that he has cleverly argued his points, and, by the frequent application of a rigid mathematical treatment, has removed his opinions from the domain of those pure speculations which are too often applied to the explanation of obscure phenomena connected with the physics of the earth."—G. Fiske, John, [his name was originally Edmund Fiske Greeen,] b. 1842, at Hartford, Conn.; graduated at Harvard College 1863, and at the law school 1865;

was admitted to the bar, but has never practised, devoting himself to the study of history and sociology, and becoming prominent among the American advocates of "Evolution" and the Spencerian philosophy. "In 1871 he arrived at the discovery of the causes of the prolonged infancy of mankind, and the part played by it in determining human development; and the importance of this contribution to the Darwinian theory, now generally admitted, was immediately recognized by Darwin and Spencer." (Appleton's Cyclopædia of American Biography, iii. 469.) He was for a time lecturer on philosophy, instructor in history, and assistant librarian at Harvard College, and has lectured on American history at University College, London, at the Royal Institution, and in many of the principal cities of the United States and Great Britain. Most of his works were originally published in successive numbers of leading American and English periodicals. 1. Tobacco and Alcohol: I. It does Pay to Smoke; II. The Coming Man will drink Wine, N. York, 1868, 16mo.

"Mr. Fiske's spicy little book is an amplified review of Mr. Parton's recent hasty writings on these difficult subjects, [see PARTON, JAMES, ante. vol. ii.] . . . Mr. Fiske brings to his subject a truly scientific spirit, and discusses it with moderation, clearness, and penetration. He develops clearly the fundamental principle that everything in diet and medication depends on the dose."—Nation, viii. 13.

2. Myths and Myth-Makers: Old Tales and Superstitions interpreted by Comparative Mythology, Bost., 1872, 12mo.

"These papers discuss one by one some of the leading classes of myths, grouped about the idea from which they seem respectively to have been developed. . . . The book, by its calm and broad spirit, is well suited to those who find themselves unprepared to follow Professor Max Müller and Mr. Cox to the full length of their hypotheses."—Nation, xvi. 253.

"A book which is at once sensible and attractive, on a subject about which much is written that is crotchety and tedious."—Ath., No. 2364.

3. Outlines of Cosmic Philosophy, based on the Doctrine of Evolution: with Criticisms on the Positive Philosophy, Bost. and Lon., 1874, 2 vols. 8vo.

"He not only fully absorbs Spencer's views, but he rearranges, condenses, and completes them. If he is at times a little too easily acquiescent, or too timid in original criticism, it is a perhaps not unpardonable fault in what hardly pretends to be more than an exposition of another's views."—Nation, xx. 135.

"Mr. Fison, a missionary long resident in Australia, and Mr. Howitt, the well-known Australian explorer, have, in this volume, done an important piece of anthropological work."—EDWARD B. TYLOR: Acad., xix. 224.

"Contains plenty of information which will interest all readers of folk-lore. . . . It seems a pity that Mr. Fison has intended to make his book the support of Mr. Morgan's theories, which are neither very logical, very consistent, nor very satisfactory in their terminology."—Sat. Rev., li. 215.

Fitzgerald, Edward, 1809–1883, b. at Bredfield, Suffolk; was the son of John Purcell, of Kilkenny, Ireland, who took his wife's name of Fitzgerald. He was educated at Bury Grammar-School, and at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated in 1830 and formed life-long friendships with Tennyson and Thackeray. He married Lucy, daughter of Bernard Barton, the Quaker poet, (q. v., ante, vol. i.,) but a separation by mutual agreement took place soon afterwards. Fitzgerald spent most of his life at his house near Woodbridge, Suffolk, devoting himself to his favorite studies and literary work. His books were issued anonymously; his translation of the Agamemnon was at first privately printed, and of a translation made by him of the Œdipus Tyrannus and Coloneus of Sophocles he allowed only one friend in England to have a copy. 1. Polonius: a Collection of Wise Saws and Modern Instances, Lon., 1852, sq. 8vo. 4. Six Dramas of Calderon freely translated by E. F., 1853, 8vo. 5. Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyám, the Astronomer-Poet of Persia: rendered into English Verse, Lon., 1859, 4to; 2d ed., 1868; 3d ed., 1872; 4th ed., containing also the Sálámán and Ábsál of Jámi, in English verse, 1878; 5th ed., 1879. (The first edition of the Rubáiyát fell absolutely dead from the press, and was soon consigned to the "fourpenny box" of second-hand dealers. D. G. Rossetti was one of its first admirers. Copies of it are now worth their weight in gold, owing partly to the belief that the poem, when again issued, was spoiled in revision. There is at least a great difference between the first edition and the later ones.)

"It is not as a translation that the English-speaking people have accepted the 'Rubáiyát' into their literature, —it is as an original poem."—Sat. Rev., lxi. 98.

"His fame will mainly rest on his marvellous rendering of the 'Quatrains' of Omar Khayyám, . . . which he has made to live in a way that no translation ever lived before. In his hands the 'Quatrains' became a new poem."—W. ALDIS WRIGHT: Dict. of Nat. Biog., xix. 112.

American edition, entitled The Ruba'iyát of 'Omar Khayyam: with an Accompaniment of Drawings by Elihu Vedder, Bost., 1884, 4to.

"Had the Ruba'iyát been translated into Latin or German four centuries ago, or into English within the memory of many still living, Albert Dürer and Blake would assuredly have been beforehand with Elihu Vedder. But neither Albert Dürer nor Blake, nor any other master dead and gone, could, I venture to think, have exceeded in sublimity and subtlety of conception at least a score of these extraordinary designs."—AMELIA B. EDWARDS: Acad., xxvi. 361.

6. Agamemnon: a Tragedy, taken from Æschylus, Lon., 1876, 4to.

"Convinced of the impossibility of presenting the Greek play in its integrity to English readers, and doubtful of his power to succeed where 'good versifiers and better scholars' had seemed to him to fail, he determined to recast the 'Agamemnon' of the Attic poet, adhering in parts to the original, and in parts diverging from it, according to his sense of fitness. The result is that, while the whole poem is profoundly penetrated with the Æschylean spirit, which it reproduces with wonderful vividness, and while certain portions are accurate transcripts from the original, the Greek student will find many of the most impressive passages suppressed, and some most carefully prepared effects omitted. . . . Mr. Fitzgerald's style in the finest passages of this great torso has a weight, a compactness, and a picturesqueness, to find the proper parallel for which we must look back to Shakespere's age."—J. A. SYMONDS: Acad., xii. 4.

"At length, six years after Fitzgerald's death, we have these three volumes, of which the last two contain nearly all that he ever printed, and the first some three hundred and fifty letters from his pen, written between 1832 and 1883, to Frederic Tennyson, Bernard Barton, Archdeacon Allen, Prof. Cowell and Prof. Norton, W. B. Donne, Samuel Lawrence, Mr. J. R. Lowell, and twenty others. . . . They are, in their general tone, just as charming as all who knew their writer looked for them to be. They present a fine, albeit an imperfect, portraiture of a singularly noble character."—Ath., No. 3220.

He borrows liberally, but with judgment; he arranges his materials skilfully. . . . If he has added little really new to the 'Lives of the Kembles,' he has at least added some fresh interest to the narrative of them."—Sat. Rev., xxxii. 342.

"The work is an odd mixture of dry official records and of stage anecdotage new and old, which is not always set down with too much care, and which is disfigured by the writer's seemingly incurable tricks of style."—Sat. Rev., liii. 239.

"In compiling his present work, which is likely to rank as his highest achievement, Mr. Fitzgerald has tried conscientiously—that is, with as much conscientiousness as a writer on theatrical subjects often exhibits—to make it good. His materials have been diligently collected, quarters hitherto neglected have been explored, a mass of new information has been obtained. . . . In spite of all the efforts he has made, Mr. Fitzgerald's book, pleasant as it is to read, is marred by an all but continuous series of slips and mistakes. . . . Much of it is worthy of praise, and the whole has vivacity which will commend it to general perusal. No picture equally animated of theatrical life is supplied in any other existing work."—Ath., No. 2841.

"He informs the reader that he has gained 'close upon three thousand pounds' by his novels and tales in Dickens's 'Household Words,' the chief merit of most of these productions being that they were 'ingeniously successful imitations of the editor's own manner.' . . . His communicativeness may be found amusing, but we have seldom met with a more useless specimen of book-making."—Ath., No. 2843.

44. The Royal Dukes and Princesses of the Family of George III.: a View of their Life and Manners for Seventy Years, 1760–1830, Lon., 1882, 2 vols. 8vo.

"Collect a sufficient quantity of matter to make two volumes, pitchfork it into them without arrangement, verification, or even decent revision of a text,—that is his simple rule. It is fair (though perhaps not strictly necessary) to say that Mr. Fitzgerald's volumes are by no means unamusing. It would have been very odd if they had been, considering the materials of which, at least in great part, they are composed. Of those materials, moreover, the Harcourt Papers, at least, are sure to be new to nearly all readers."—Sat. Rev., liv. 796.

"Mainly devoted to the career of Richard Brinsley Sheridan. . . . A new biography of the famous dramatist, orator, and wit is justified, as Mr. Fitzgerald explains, by the materials which have accumulated since Moore's life was given to the world. . . . Mr. Fitzgerald writes throughout with his eye upon Moore's pages, and he is much concerned to destroy the character with which his first biographer had succeeded in investing Sheridan before the world. . . . In spite of Mr. Fitzgerald's obvious industry, his volumes are unmethodical and discursive. To any one who wishes to turn over the pages and pick out good anecdotes about Sheridan or his contemporaries, they are pleasant enough reading. But to the more serious student . . . they would only prove bewildering."—Acad., xxxi. 158.

"This Life strongly illustrates many events of an exciting period."—Sat. Rev., xxxix. 628.

"One of the suppressed characters of English history is restored to us, and we marvel only that Lord Shelburne's autobiography should have waited to be edited by his great-grandson, instead of having been published early in the present century by his son, unless, as we hear, its existence was really unknown till last year. . . . The characters of leading statesmen are gems, and epigrams which will dwell in the memory abound."—Ath., No. 2471.

"Lord Edmund Fitzmaurice has succeeded in placing before us a wealth of new matter which, while casting valuable and much-needed light on several obscure passages in the political history of a hundred years ago, has enabled us for the first time to form a clear and consistent idea of his ancestor, who played so distinguished a part in the great drama, but of whom hitherto it might, though in another sense, be as truly said as of his contemporary, Junius, 'Stat nominis umbra.'"—Spectator, xlix. 1476.

"We should be ungrateful not to admit that he has done his work laboriously and conscientiously, for he has given us a great deal of enjoyment. He had certain essential qualifications for his task,—a fervid appreciation of religious eloquence, a keen perception of Irish humour, and a heartfelt reverence for Father Thomas Burke. And for these very reasons we are sure he would be the first to admit that the Life might well have been written by a man who had the real biographical genius which flowers, like the fabulous aloe, only once in some hundred years. . . . Father Burke was one of those remarkable men who might live in the friendship of unborn generations. He was nobly great, yet extremely human. . . . In many respects he came nearer to the ideal of his Master's career than any clergyman of whom we have ever read."—Sat. Rev., lxi. 445.

"The O'Connell of this correspondence is a most human creature, good, lovable, honest, but no more heroic than ruffianly, and the chief impression it creates is of surprise that a character so ordinary should gain such surprising influence and make so great a mark in the world's history. . . . The letters show us a man of stupendous vigour, of large and ready sympathies, of tender and deep domestic affections, of good sense and some acumen, and of religious feeling that is really touching in its child-like simplicity and unquestioning faith; but neither his religion nor his patriotism inspired him to the sterner virtues of austerity and self-sacrifice. Nor does he seem to have had a lofty or uncommon thought: indeed, the O'Connell of these volumes is as good as bread, and as ordinary."—Ath., No. 3185.

"A thick volume, designed to cultivate a love of nature and to recommend simplicity of life. It is much better adapted to the first of these purposes than to the second, its method being to point out, as it does carefully and well, though sometimes too much in the manner of a catalogue, the leading points of beauty and interest in the natural objects of the old, neglected roads and paths and farmsteads of the less cultivated parts of Eastern Massachusetts."—Nation, xviii. 64.

J. Fox, Henry Erskine, and other notable persons, and was called the "father of burgh reform." Autobiography of Mrs. Fletcher, of Edinburgh: with Selections from Letters and other Family Memorials. Compiled and arranged by the Survivor of her Family, [Lady Richardson, widow of Sir John Richardson, the Arctic explorer.] Carlisle, 1874, 8vo, (this was a small edition printed for private circulation;) Edin., 1875, 8vo.

"This interesting volume contains more than the title-page promises. There are not only the incidents of the Yorkshire and Scottish life of Mrs. Fletcher, told by herself, but a sympathetic memoir, also by Mrs. Fletcher, of her gentle daughter, Grace, and another of her son, Archibald, by his widow. The whole forms an attractive, and often amusing, picture of life in Great Britain in the last and present centuries. . . . It is emphatically a charming book."—Ath., No. 2479.

"There is something unusually clever and graceful in this little novel. . . . The talk is often clever, sometimes witty; but it is inferior to the description, which is usually excellent, and frequently charming."—Nation, xxiv. 341.

2. Mirage, ("No Name" Ser.,) Bost., 1878, 16mo.

3. The Head of Medusa, Lon., 1880, 3 vols. p. 8vo; Bost., 1 vol. 16mo.

"'All claret would be port if it could,' and most American novels would be by Mr. Henry James if they had the luck. 'The Head of Medusa' is no exception to this rule. The situations, the 'international' combinations of English, Americans, and Italians, are constructed on the model of Mr. James's stories. . . . The padding, of which 'The Head of Medusa' is all compact, is sentimental in the manner of Miss Thackeray. . . . The book is full of talent." —Sat. Rev., l. 550.

4. Notes on a Collection of Pictures, by G. Costa, Lon., 1882, 8vo. 5. Vestigia, Bost., 1884, 16mo.

"It is not the solving of a riddle, but the development of two or three simple, noble motives. . . . The action is much simpler than anything the author has before attempted, and her style has gained correspondingly. . . . There is only so much of the fair Italian sky and sea as to throw into relief the figures, but so deft, so sympathetic is the choice, the few pages give the sense that all Italy is in the book."—Nation, xxxviii. 301.

"A delightful and yet irritating novel,—delightful, because the simple love-idyll of which it consists is told with peculiar grace and charm; irritating, because one of the chief motives of the story is palpably absurd."—Acad., xxv. 128.

"All histories of abstract ideas are liable to the same defect,—namely, that they tend to become mere abstracts of the books professedly published on the subject. Professor Flint is no exception. After an attempt, in an introduction of sixty pages, to pursue and disengage his idea through the early, classical, and mediæval periods, he fairly lapses into the usual system of analyzing books. . . . We are most thankful to Mr. Flint for the labour he has bestowed on giving in an intelligible form a summary of the speculations, or ideas, of Schlözer, von Müller, Kant, Schelling, Steffens, Görres, Krause, Lotze, many of whose books are either inaccessible or are too toilsome reading to repay the time it would cost to extract any valuable metal from the dross."—*Sat. "Mr. Foley has at last brought his gigantic labours to a close. . . . He has collected such a mass of curious and really valuable information as it is granted to very few students to gather by the researches of a lifetime. He has added materially to those recondite sources of authentic family history which are for the most part buried in private archives and guarded with superstitious exclusiveness from the vulgar gaze. He has drawn back the veil which for centuries had covered the working of the Jesuits in England, and which, while it was allowed to hide the doings of the fathers from the gaze of the profane, invested them with a glamour of awe and terror such as no secret society of past or present times has succeeded in throwing round its proceedings."—Ath., No. 2912.

Letters of John Keats to Fanny Brawne, written in the Years 1818 and 1819, and now given from the Original Manuscripts: with Introduction and Notes, Lon., 1878, 8vo. (Contains a portrait etched by W. B. Scott from Severn's drawing of Keats on his death-bed, a silhouette of Miss Brawne, and a fac-simile of one of the letters, printed on paper of the same kind as the original and manufactured in the same year.)

"Even the truest admirers of Keats will read these letters with a sense that they are prying into what he would have kept from them if he could. . . . We cannot say, then, that the reading of this little volume has given us anything like unmixed pleasure. We have felt all through it that we were guilty of an intrusion, which, like all intrusions into such a region, Keats would have warmly resented. And we have felt, too, something besides this, . . . that much in these letters which Keats could easily have justified, and would have justified, if he had been writing a poem or a play, by the very simple expedient of making us see the object of his passion, as well as the glow of the subjective passion itself, has an uncomfortably naked, unnatural effect here, when we have only his own side of the relation, and hardly even a single glimpse of the other side of it. . . . But, though this little book is in both the ways we have mentioned distasteful to us, it would be false to say that it is without interest. It bears the marks of Keats's genius in many of the letters, and the marks of his individual character in almost all."—Spectator, li. 410.

"We do not think Mr. Buxton Forman's publication necessary. It can hardly give pleasure to any one who cares for Keats, or, if it does, the pleasure is so mingled with pain that, to use the poet's own phrase, 'it tastes like brass on the palate.'"—Sat. Rev., xlv. 216.

"I think there is nothing dishonourable in the joy with which we welcome these dear relics of Keats. . . . They relate to what happened nearly sixty years ago; hardly any one, except Mr. Severn and Mr. Wells, can remember any of the persons concerned; and the lady herself, to whom these letters were addressed, expressed before she died, in 1856, her belief that they would be eventually required for publication. There has, therefore, been no indecent hurry in the matter, and Mr. Forman has displayed in editing them a scrupulous care and a tasteful delicacy that will do him great credit. He is a bibliographer of genius, and on every obscure point he has patiently concentrated the light of investigation."—EDMUND W. GOSSE: Acad., xiii. 111.

"Mr. Forster wrote his [Sir John Eliot's] first Life, and he has now in all probability written his last. As he opened the vein, he has also exhausted it. Many writers in the ages yet to come will have to treat of Eliot,—as the name of one of our immortals,—but no fair critic will be able to go through this period of our national history without feeling and acknowledging at every turn his obligations to Mr. Forster."—Ath., No. 1898.

5. The Life of Charles Dickens, Lon., 1871–74, 3 vols. 8vo.

"A book which, in spite of the many traits of astonishing perceptive power, and prodigal generosity, and unbounded humour, contained in it, will certainly not add to the personal fascination with which Dickens is regarded by so many of his countrymen. . . . On the whole, we cannot deny that Mr. Forster's biography was a very difficult book indeed to write, or that it has been well done. It has painted to us a picture morally much more disappointing than we expected, and it has perhaps dwelt on some of the most disappointing features at unnecessary length, and with a certain awkward air of half admission, half deprecation. There is far too much criticism on individual works of Dickens, to some of which Mr. Forster recurs repeatedly; and it does not appear to us that the criticism is always sound. . . . But, with all these faults and shortcomings, Mr. Forster's Life of Dickens will always be eagerly read as long as Dickens himself is eagerly read; and that will be as long as Englishmen retain their delight in English literature."—Spectator, xlvii. 174.

"The portrait of Dickens is, indeed, very incomplete and unsatisfactory; but it would be unfair to deny that it puts us in possession of many facts which render both the merits and the defects of the novels more intelligible. That will be its principal merit, for its independent interest is certainly less than might have been expected from the subject."—Sat. Rev., xxxvii. 182.

"On the whole, we have in Mr. Forster's biography a difficult work well done. We believe it gives with candor the means of forming a sound judgment of the nature and character of its subject. That it gives the true estimate of his literary genius and of the quality and rank of his various works we for one shall not say; but it would be strange indeed if the average reader and student of an author should think so highly of him and feel so warmly about him as his intimate friend, admirer, and biographer, with all a biographer's and all a friend's fealty and fondness. . . . To the fulness of detail in the story of the novelist's exterior life, of his literary methods, and of the production and appearance of his books, we suppose no afterworker in this field can much hope to add anything that has escaped Mr. Forster's knowledge or scrutiny, or for which his copiousness has not found room."—Nation, xviii. 175.

6. Life of Jonathan Swift: vol. i., 1667–1711, Lon., 1875, 8vo.

"With the conscientiousness and thoroughness to which his previous works have accustomed us, Mr. Forster has gathered, sifted, and interpreted the materials within his reach; there is in his book much that is new by the side of what is old, but more that is true in the place of what is false. In the way of positive discoveries of fresh facts of importance there is, as yet at all events, little to announce."—Sat. Rev., xl. 714.

"To the student of the period, one of the most interesting in our annals, Mr. Forster's biography promises to be invaluable. . . . The writer seems to be overweighted by his materials: he has so much to say, so many errors to point out, so many objections to meet, so many allusions to explain, that the narrative is occasionally impeded and does not move freely. The author never stops without a cause, or without having some noteworthy fact to state, but nevertheless the reader, instead of being driven smoothly along the road, finds himself suddenly pulled up. The literary student will enjoy this heartily, for he is sure to gain generous refreshment at these halting-points, but the general reader, whose interest in Swift is comparatively slight, and whose knowledge of the age is superficial, will hardly appreciate the wealth of illustration Mr. Forster has at his command."—Spectator, xlix. 47.

"We are glad to be able to congratulate Mr. Foster on the result of this great undertaking. That a single individual should have the energy and the patience to carry through a book of so laborious a character is a striking testimony to his knowledge and his powers. Three thousand two hundred and sixty-four closely-printed columns, each of them teeming with scores of facts, and positively bristling with dates, represent an achievement of which any man might be proud, and the more so when the general accuracy of this vast mass of information has been so widely and authoritatively acknowledged."—Ath., No. 3225.

"His work is the outcome of a long and high tradition. He is one of those who look on morality as something not imposed on man from without, but the resultant, the realization, of his whole nature. . . . He has produced what is, perhaps, for students the best existing work on the subject. It will show them how the lessons of their old text-books can without any strain be so extended as to cover the vast and complex interests of modern life."—ALFRED W. BENN: Acad., xxxii. 47.

Fox, Miss Caroline, 1819–1871, b. at Falmouth, Eng.; daughter of Robert Ware Fox, of a well-known Quaker family; began at sixteen to keep a journal, in which she made notes of conversations with Sterling, Mill, Carlyle, and other literary men whom she numbered among her friends. Memories of Old Friends: being Extracts from the Journals and Letters of Caroline Fox, of Penjerrick, Cornwall, 1835–1871. Edited by Horace N. Pym. Lon., 1881, r. 8vo; new ed., 1883.

"Thrown partly by accident, partly by the connections of her family and her father's scientific reputation, partly by her own personal charm and her delight in the society of remarkable people, into contact with an extraordinary number of such persons, Miss Fox had also the industry to make notes of what she heard and saw, and the genius (for no lesser word will do) to put these notes in the most striking if also the least pretentious manner. The persons chiefly illustrated in these 'Memories' are Derwent and Hartley Coleridge, J. S. Mill, Sterling, Carlyle, and Bunsen; but it is hardly too much to say that few Englishmen or residents in England celebrated in science and letters between 1840 and 1850 fail to make some appearance here."—Ath., No. 2828.

"The bold, clear, nervous English of the book is throughout in admirable harmony with the clear, definite treatment of its subject, the precision with which it expresses the principles on which its author works, and the vigour with which he works them out. Not less remarkable is Mr. Freeman's command over the enormous mass of facts which he has laid under contribution. The book is a perfect mine of learning on the subject which it treats. . . . There is evidently a powerful attraction for Mr. Freeman in the outer aspects of war and policy which throughout tends to lead him away from the examination of those deeper questions which lie beneath them. . . . Throughout there is too much of wars and witenagemots, and too little of the life, the tendencies, the sentiments, of the people."—Sat. Rev., xxiii. 469, 532.

"Mr. Freeman passes silently by religion, intellect, society. He views and admires the people gathered in its witan, but he never takes us home to the thegn's hall or the peasant's hut. Of the actual life, the manners, the tastes, of our forefathers, this book tells us nothing."—Sat. Rev., xxvi. 229.

"Few figures . . . are more fitted to kindle the imagination of the historian [than that of William the Conqueror,] and it is a little disappointing when we find that Mr. Freeman regards it with a coldness which tells upon every page of his book. It is not that he is ever purposely unjust to the Conqueror; it is that one feels throughout what a distinctly moral effort it costs him to be just. More than just he is resolute not to be. There is not a trace of sympathy, of fervid admiration, of enthusiasm, in the picture. The historian has washed off the brilliant colours in which he painted Harold from his palette, and sketches his great rival accurately and conscientiously, but in gray. The result is inevitable. We bow with respect before the care and accuracy which are displayed, but we gain no lifelike impression of William."—Sat. Rev., xxxiii. 151, 186.

"It is not too much to say that the publication of this work has been an era in historical study among English-speaking peoples; his glowing pages are the medium through which the results of the profound scholarship of others as well as himself have become a common possession. If his patriotism at times almost verges on chauvinism, if his hero-worship often blinds him to the faults of his favorites, his tone is at any rate always healthy and elevated; he never turns vices into virtues, his enthusiasm is never lavished upon vulgar and factitious excellences."—Nation, xxiii. 331.

"It is . . . the work of a real historian, not of a mere historical critic, one endowed with a sense of art and symmetry, and able to paint a battle or a man. Its defects are those incident to the author's position as a pioneer in the field of history. He is compelled to argue while he narrates, and half his book reads like a commentary on the other half."—RICHARD GARNETT: art. Literature, in The Reign of Queen Victoria, ii. 475.

4. Old English History for Children, Lon., 1869, 12mo.

"His book has the special charm of being in its origin a real children's book. It was 'begun a good many years ago, and was written bit by bit for the use of my own children, as they wanted it, or as I found time to write it.' . . . In all the earlier and better portions of the book it is good clear children's talk."—Sat. Rev., xxviii. 678.

"He is perhaps rather too fond of a fight, too impatient of ignorance, too harsh in his judgment of adversaries whose position he has not entered into. But it is always for what he regards as truth and justice that he fights; and he never touches a question without adding to our comprehension of it, without leaving the impression of an ample knowledge, a righteous purpose, a clear and powerful understanding."—*Sat. 7. General Sketch of European History, Lon., 1872, 18mo; new ed., 1876.

"A wonderful little book, a miracle of compression as of clearness, of learning as of plainness of speech. . . . While simple enough for the boy learner in the schools, it contains a mass of information from which the most advanced historical students will find much to glean."—Sat. Rev., xxxv. 388.

8. The Growth of the English Constitution, from the Earliest Times, Lon., 1872, p. 8vo: 2d ed., 1873.

"In some hundred and fifty pages of text we are taken in a pleasant and chatty fashion over the whole course of our Constitution, from the moment when it landed on the shores of Britain with our English forefathers to the present day."—Sat. Rev., xxxiii. 573.

9. The Unity of History: the Rede Lecture, Lon., 1872, p. 8vo. 10. Comparative Politics: Six Lectures read before the Royal Institution in January and February, 1873. With The Unity of History, the Rede Lecture read before the University of Cambridge, May 29, 1872. Lon., 1873, 8vo.

"The results of the whole investigation can scarcely be called satisfactory. The number of institutions for which a common origin is claimed is small, and, what is worse, the proof on which it rests is very slender."—Acad., v. 277.

"Mr. Freeman has compared Greek, Italian, and Teutonic institutions in an excellent manner. But the object for which the comparison was instituted he has altogether failed, in our opinion, to attain. We cannot find that he has thrown any light upon the primitive Aryan constitution; or, rather, we think that the facts he has adduced tend to a conclusion quite different from that which he has drawn."—Ath., No. 2413.

"His sketches, whether of pen or of pencil, (the illustrations agree admirably in character with the text,) place before us in firm outline the leading features of a series of buildings interesting in their historical connection, and impress the lesson how in this way, as in so many others, Pagan Rome survived throughout Christian Europe."—Acad., x. 489.

"As far as this aggressive little volume concerns itself with architecture it is unreliable, almost illiterate, and its illustrations are an affront to the reader and to art."—Nation, xxvi. 137.

"He aims at proving, as he puts it comically in his preface, that the Turk in Europe answers to Lord Palmerston's definition of dirt; he is 'matter in the wrong place.' In order to bring this fact home to the reason and imagination of those who read his book, he takes the Turk from his first apparition on the stage of history, and traces his ways and doings down to the present time."—Spectator, l. 1097.

The Historical Geography of Europe: vol. i., Text; vol. ii., Maps, Lon., 1881, 2 vols. 8vo; 2d ed., 1882.

"Mr. Freeman has done much more than compile a hand-book for students; he has made a substantial contribution to political history. He has not only given definitions of boundaries, but he has shown the causes of the alteration in each case. In this way he has supplied a framework of European history, and has accounted for the process of differentiation by which the various states were formed. . . . Mr. Freeman's book will for the future place at every one's command accurate knowledge of the points involved in proposals of territorial changes. It deserves to be reckoned as an indispensable introduction to the study of foreign politics."—Ath., No. 2792.

19. Sketches from the Subject and Neighbour Lands of Venice. Illust. Lon., 1881, p. 8vo.

"We shall be surprised if this book does not do something to bring the Dalmatian coast into the sphere of the researches of enterprising tourists. It certainly assigns sufficient reasons for turning our footsteps in that quarter, and it gives sufficient guidance for an intelligent understanding of the monuments which there exist."—M. CREIGHTON: Acad., xx. 439.

20. An Introduction to American Institutional History, ("Johns Hopkins University Studies,") Balt., 1882, 8vo. 21. The Reign of William Rufus and the Accession of Henry the First, Oxf., 1882, 2 vols. 8vo.

"From Mr. Freeman's point of view—or rather from one of his many points of view, for he looks at his subject in many aspects—the period from the accession of William Rufus down to the overthrow of Robert of Bellême by King Henry was the time in which was worked out the problem of reconciling the English nation to the Norman Conquest, of nationalizing, as Mr. Freeman expresses it, the Conquest and the dynasty which the Conquest had brought in. . . . There are no signs of the weariness and exhaustion that sometimes mark a continuation. Mr. Freeman is as profoundly interested in his work, as decided in his views of right and wrong, as minute and careful in working out every detail, as ever."—Sat. Rev., liii. 566.

"The last thirteen years of the eleventh century are depicted with all the wealth of detail, all the vividness of narrative, all the fulness of local and personal knowledge, which distinguish Mr. Freeman's history of the Norman Conquest. But, it must be confessed, the later part of the story falls in interest considerably behind the earlier."—Ath., No. 2861.

22. Lectures to American Audiences: I., The English People in its Three Homes; II., The Practical Bearings of General European History, Phila., 1882; Lon., 1883, p. 8vo.

"It must be confessed that Mr. Freeman approaches the American public somewhat in the spirit of a missionary, as if the American public had not been reading his books for twenty years. The first course is precisely adapted to an audience that had never heard of Mr. Freeman or of 'the English people in their three homes.' The thought is excessively diluted, but it is agreeably stated, and will prepare the neophyte very satisfactorily for the stronger meat of the second course. . . . Mr. Freeman's comments and criticisms upon our political machinery and methods are always sagacious and worthy of consideration."—Nation, xxxvi. 40.

23. English Towns and Districts: Addresses and Sketches. Illust. and Maps. Lon., 1883, 8vo.

"Wherever buildings and ruins are wanting, Mr. Freeman's interest in a period seems to fail him. He greatly prefers stones to syllables. . . . The obvious answer to this criticism, of course, is that the original scope of each paper was antiquarian rather than literary."—Acad., xxiv. 2.

24. Some Impressions of the United States, Lon., 1883, p. 8vo.

"His desire to be fair has led him to be so cautious that it is really often very difficult to get from his book a distinct idea of what his impressions were. . . . His book is in part a labored attempt to show that we are more English than anything else. . . . It is a very misleading kind of criticism. It is only by seeing how our life differs from English life that we get any clear idea about ourselves."—Nation, xxxvi. 494.

"He tells us that his book is the fruit of a six months' visit to the United States; and surely to have observed so carefully, to have accumulated so many facts in so short a time, must be looked upon as no ordinary performance. Nor is it his industry alone that deserves praise: Mr. Freeman desires to see the object fairly, and he reproduces the impression it makes upon him with much faithfulness; the result is that the likeness of Brother Jonathan which is accepted in England as exact is seen to be a mere caricature."—Spectator, lvi. 867. 27. The Methods of Historical Study: Eight Lectures read in the University of Oxford: with the Inaugural Lecture on the Office of the Historical Professor, Oxf., 1886, 8vo.

"His general views, as regards his subject, are . . . not very clear or profound; and he sometimes enters on trains of reflection of a very ordinary and obvious kind, and expresses them in far from happy language. Nevertheless his work is, on the whole, good; his antiquarian knowledge is most valuable; he points out the true methods of studying history, if his ideal is scarcely possible to attain."—WILLIAM O'CONNOR MORRIS: Acad., xxx. 81.

28. The Chief Periods of European History: Six Lectures read in the University of Oxford: with an Essay on Greek Cities under Roman Rule, Lon., 1887, 8vo.

"These six lectures are on Europe before the Roman power, on Rome the head of Europe, Rome and the new nations, on the divided empire, on survivals of empire, and on the world Romeless. They are all interesting, but much is naturally a summary of what we have read before. . . . The essay on Greek cities under Roman rule is newer and perhaps more interesting."—Acad., xxxi. 442.

"No historian has studied this period with greater care than Mr. Friedmann. It is true that he relies mainly for his facts on the letters of foreign ambassadors who were hostile to Henry VIII. and were constantly engaged in opposing him, but their testimony is amply supported by other evidence."—Ath., No. 2986.

"How closely connected the history of Anne Boleyn was with the continental politics of Europe has never been adequately shown by any writer till now. "However well meant, this work is not well executed. . . . An uncritical reader will carry from its perusal a useful, working, dictionary-article view of the great Italian thinker: but, for scholars conversant with his work and times, the Life of Giordano Bruno has yet to be written." —JOHN OWEN: Acad., xxxii. 161.

"The merit of the book is that to its writer the philosophy of Bruno is vital and full of attraction. . . . Bruno's writings have been studied with scrupulous care, and in them the author has found a message for herself, and has succeeded in setting forth that message for others to hear and understand."—Ath. No. 3103.

Froude, James Anthony, LL.D., [ante, vol. i., add.,] b. 1818, at Darlington, Devonshire; son of the late Ven. R. H. Froude, Archdeacon of Totnes; was educated at Westminster School, and at Oriel College, Oxford, where he came under the influence of the Tractarian movement, of which his brother, Richard Hurrell Froude, (q. v., ante, vol. i.,) was one of the leaders. In 1840 he took his degree with a second class in Classics, and in 1842 he gained the Chancellor's prize for an English essay, and was elected Fellow of Exeter College. In 1844 he took deacon's orders in the Church of England. A fundamental change of views led to his abandonment of his fellowship and of a clerical life, and, being debarred by his orders from a profession, he devoted himself entirely to letters, contributing largely to Fraser's Magazine and to the Westminster Review. Of the former periodical he was for some time editor at a later period, resigning that office in 1871. In 1867 he was elected rector of the University of St. Andrews. In 1872 he took advantage of the Clerical Disabilities Act to relinquish formally the office of deacon. In the autumn of the same year he visited the United States and delivered lectures on the relations between England and Ireland, which led him into an animated controversy with Father Thomas Burke, supra, the Dominican orator. In 1874 he was sent by the government of Lord Beaconsfield to the Cape of Good Hope on a mission connected with the scheme for the federation of the South African colonies. Later he made a voyage to Australia and another to the West Indies. He was one of the executors of Carlyle, and was intrusted with the task of editing his literary remains and writing his life. His editions of Carlyle's Reminiscences, &c., and of Mrs. Carlyle's Letters are entered under the names of the writers, supra. 1. History of England from the Fall of Wolsey to the Defeat of the Spanish Armada, Lon., 1856–70, 12 vols. 8vo; new ed., 1881–82, cr. 8vo. (The title was originally History of England from the Fall of Wolsey to the Death of Elizabeth. Vols. i.–iv. are mentioned ante, vol. ii.)

"He writes under the auspices of a new school of historical composition, which requires effect to be produced not by brilliant rhetoric and imposing generalization, but by minute accuracy of detail . . . Mr. Froude has evidently a genuine love of historical research, which has led him to make the most of the increased copiousness of his materials; and the chapters of his book on the Protestants, on Ireland, on Scotland, on the Pilgrimage of Grace, and on the French War, as well as many minor portions of the work, are so much fuller than the accounts of the same subjects given by his predecessors, that they may be said to be additions to the history of England. . . . The details are selected with judgment and taste, and thrown into a vivid and striking form by the powers of a fine imagination. The narrative moves slow; nor has Mr. Froude the rare gift of preserving the perfect unity of a great historical drama amidst great complexity of events and frequent shiftings of the scene. . . . The book is greatly overloaded with long quotations from State Papers; but this arises less from a fault of literary judgment than from an exaggerated estimate of the historical and moral value of everything that proceeded from the government of Henry VIII. . . . Mr. Froude has a great command of beautiful imagery, which, as might be expected, sometimes runs a little wild. The tone of his writing is sometimes rather mawkish: we come to read history, not to sigh over it. But this again is the exaggeration of a genuine sensibility which lies at the root of a good deal of the excellency of his work. . . . The extended religious experience and converse which Mr. Froude has gone through in the course of his devious theological career has given him a great advantage in depicting the various shades of religious sentiment and the various phases of religious party. . . . We doubt whether in this great qualification for portraying the phases of a complicated, various, and wavering religious movement, he has ever had a superior among historians. But Mr. Froude does not possess the same advantages in dealing with questions of politics, jurisprudence, or political economy, as in dealing with religious questions. . . . Mr. Froude seems to have thought that it would be an unsatisfactory result of all his laborious researches if they ended in furnishing him merely with a mass of new and interesting details illustrating the received view of the occurrences of the time, or even with some important modifications of that view in regard to questions of a secondary kind. Some great discovery must be made to reward adequately so much labour, and to satisfy the expectation raised by the opening of mines of documentary evidence hitherto unexplored. This discovery is, that the reign of Henry VIII. is a 'palimpsest,' the original writing of which being restored by Mr. Froude, who has detected it beneath the legends written over it by calumny and prejudice, Henry VIII., though his administration was beset with difficulties and clouded by domestic infelicity, comes forth as a perfect king, while his supposed victims are converted into criminals, whom the best of sovereigns was compelled, by their misdeeds, and by the urgent pressure of circumstances, to sacrifice to his sense of public duty."—Edinburgh Review, cviii. 206 et seq.: review of vols. i.–iv.

"It is an eminently readable book. Of all Mr. Froude's high qualities as a historian, we should place picturesqueness first; his account of the Armada, for instance, is even finer than Mr. Motley's, and the chapters on the rebellions in Ireland are exceedingly graphic. Hardly inferior to this, if inferior at all, is his power of grasping the essential ideas of the period of which he is treating, and placing them clearly and strongly before the reader. . . . His powers of analysis, both of policy and character, are good, although less marked than the qualities already mentioned. . . . While . . . we do not think that Mr. Froude's place will be in the first rank of historians, we do not hesitate to pronounce this work an adequate and worthy history of that great period during which the change was made from Popery to Protestantism, and at the same time the English nation entered upon that career of enterprise and adventure, of thought and action, which conducted to the great revolutions and the maritime ascendency of the seventeenth century."—Nation, x. 323.

"The writer possesses many of the qualifications necessary to an historian of the first rank. With ample materials gathered and deciphered at the expense of time and labour which none can properly estimate who has not himself tried the process; with a power of graphic delineation, and a skill in the selection of such incidents as give completeness and interest to the narrative; with an insight into the characters that pass before him in the panoramic picture which prepares for a fair estimate of their capacity; with the patriotic feelings of an Englishman, the love of freedom natural to a Protestant, antipathy to despotism, spiritual as well as political, sympathy with man's intellectual and moral progress, the historian takes a high place among those whose reputation is destined to endure. Mr. Froude is never dull or wearisome, though his history abounds in details. Weaving his web with constructive art, it comes forth from his hands having mark and finish upon it."—Ath., No. 2198.

8. Cæsar: a Sketch, Lon., 1879, 8vo.

"There is much in Mr. Froude's estimates of men and measures from which we entirely dissent, and his judgment of some of the most prominent characters in the last times of the Roman Republic seem to us neither sound nor subtle. But in such matters differences of opinion are inevitable, and, as a rule, the tone of his sketch seems to us to be temperate and its candour undeniable. . . . In general Mr. Froude's book has little enough of freshness either in its method of treating its subject or in the conclusions at which it arrives; so that we doubt whether it is likely to be singled out by the readers of a remoter future from among the many tributes to Cæsar and Cæsarism which our generation has produced."—*Sat. "As Hamlet's father was sent by his unnatural brother to his grave with all his imperfections full upon him, so has Carlyle been recalled from his tomb by one who professes to have felt for him the love and veneration of a son, but who has performed by some marvellous perversion of judgment all that might have been looked for from his worst enemy. . . . He [Carlyle] was a man of the most independent, honest character and of lofty thoughts, who would not for any worldly advantage abate one jot of his own standard of right and duty, essentially of a generous and kindly nature, a delightful companion, shining in society, a good son, a devoted brother, a really affectionate husband and friend, and the author of all those great contributions to English literature which have for so long placed him in the front rank of historians and essayists. This being so, why has every fault and weakness been traced with such loving insistence as to spare no ugly or repulsive detail? . . . Why need every splenetic and hasty remark of scorn or condemnation spoken or found in the letters or journals have been preserved and printed for the misguidance of posterity? . . . Why need the discomforts occasioned between him and his wife by what should have been a thoroughly useful and agreeable friendship be dwelt upon at such length and with so much zest? . . . It is, of course, impossible to note all the matters of consequence and amusement in these pregnant volumes, which, with due expression of regret for the spirit in which it has seemed right to produce them, cannot be laid down without a deep feeling of their importance and surpassing interest."—Sat. Rev., lviii. 598.

"Carlyle was a great moral teacher, or he was nothing. If he was such a teacher, then he must (to use Mr. Arnold's description of Joubert) have sincerely loved light, and not preferred to it any little private darkness of his own. If he can be proved to have been consciously and tyrannically selfish, then undoubtedly his practice did not square with his teaching. If biographies are to be studies in the moral nude, biographers should imitate the scrupulous, the relentless painstaking of Mr. Alma Tadema. On the whole, therefore, Mr. Froude's courage in fulfilling his task in his own way, unmoved by the censure of the newspaper-press, —'that huge engine,' according to the author of 'On Compromise,' 'for keeping discussion on a low level,'—is as much to be admired as it is characteristic."—W. Wallace: Acad., xxiii. 267.

"It would to some readers be a relief if more plausible and more complicated paradoxes had not seemed to combine a purpose of proselytism with one of the most interesting biographies in the English language; yet, when the controversies which have been raised in portions of the book are disregarded and forgotten, the heroic personality of Carlyle, as it is presented by Mr. Froude, will long survive."—G. "This volume is a political tract. It makes some pretension to being a book of travels, but in that regard it is only a miserable make-believe. . . . Along the whole route the author looks with insular eyes, and jaundiced besides." —Nation, xlii. 155.

"A somewhat abstruse but important and clearly-defined problem is carefully examined in good historical light, and the conclusion is reached that, contrary to views now widely current, the Infinite is 'neither contradictory nor beyond the grasp of the human mind.' . . . It is a work that every student of Kant should know, and is a really valuable contribution to an important topic."—Nation, xliv. 370.

Fullerton, Lady Georgiana Charlotte, [ante, vol. i., add.,] 1812–1885, b. at Tixall Hall, Staffordshire, Eng.; was the daughter of Lord Granville Levison Gower, afterwards first Earl Granville. Her early life was spent chiefly in Paris, where her father was ambassador. In 1833 she married Alexander George Fullerton, of Ballintoy Castle, County Antrim, Ireland, who joined the Roman Catholic Church in 1843, and was followed in 1846 by Lady Georgiana. After the death of her only son in 1854 she gave herself up entirely to religious and benevolent works, devoting the money gained by her books to philanthropic purposes. For biog., see COLERIDGE, H. Furness, Mrs. Helen Kate, (Rogers,) 1837–1883, b. in Philadelphia; wife of Horace Howard Furness, infra. A Concordance to Shakespeare's Poems: an Index to Every Word therein contained, Phila., 1874, r. 8vo. (Contains also the text of the poems.)

"It would be hard to exaggerate Mrs. Furness's industry and faithfulness; and if we were to make any complaint about the book, it would be that lavish care and industry had made it almost too good."—Nation, xviii. 412.

"This work supplies an undoubted want, and, we are happy to add, it supplies it in an admirable manner. . . . It is a credit to herself, to her sex, and to her nation. Properly considered, it is a most valuable contribution to true Shakespearian study, by the side of which much of what passes for Shakespearian lore is shown in its full worthlessness."—Ath., No. 2446.

"We do not think we exaggerate when we say that no two more effective and inestimable helps to real Shakspearian criticism exist than the volumes for which we are so deeply indebted to Mrs. Cowden Clarke and Mrs. Horace Howard Furness. We welcome the newly-arrived one with the utmost heartiness. It is like the coming of a fresh breeze that will never cease to blow, to blow away the foolish phantasies that are perpetually issuing from the brains of ill-informed guess-mongers, to blow strength and vigour into all criticisms that are genuine births of knowledge and of sound and healthful judgment."—J. W. Hales: Acad., vi. 420.

Furness, Horace Howard, Ph.D., LL.D., son of Rev. W. H. Furness, infra; b. 1833, in Philadelphia; graduated at Harvard 1854; admitted to the bar 1859; has devoted himself during many years to Shakespearian studies, and has accumulated materials for the illustration of the poet's works unrivalled probably in value and extent by any similar collection in America. The honorary degree of Ph.D. has been conferred upon him by the University of Göttingen, in recognition of his eminent services to Shakespearian literature. He is an active member of the board of trustees of the University of Pennsylvania. 1. (Ed.) A New Variorum Edition of Shakespeare: vol. i., Romeo and Juliet, Phila., 1871, imp. 8vo.

"That a new Variorum Shakespeare is wanted no one will be inclined to dispute. The last work of the kind . . . appeared in 1821. In the half-century since then, Shakespearian studies have been carried on with constantly increasing activity. . . We have thus a Shakespearian literature wonderful for extent and variety. It is clearly time that some one should go through it, and present its substance in a condensed and acceptable form. . . . This is the task—opus vere operosum—which Mr. Furness has undertaken. . . . In deciding what to admit the editor has exercised a liberal judgment. He has preferred, with reason, to err on the side of fulness rather than of defect. . . . One aim of his work was to present a history of Shakespearian interpretation: and for this it was necessary that imperfect or erroneous views should appear in it as well as the correct. . . . From a variety of indications we are satisfied that his self-imposed task has been executed with conscientious and unwearied fidelity."—Nation, xii. 307.

"So much has been done in the way of discovery and correction since the appearance of Malone's edition in 1821, that, if the American editor maintains throughout the work the spirit and industry which he has displayed in his first volume, he will furnish a new reference Shakespeare that, in bookseller's phrase, no library should be without."—Spectator, xliv. 801.

2. Vol. ii., Macbeth, 1873.

"It is impossible to criticise, within any reasonable limits, a volume so full of valuable matter. We can but repeat our expressions of welcome of this excellent American contribution to the study of our greatest poet, and give it our cordial approval."—Ath., No. 2389.

3. Vols. iii., iv., Hamlet, 1877, 2 vols.

"'Hamlet' is in bulk double either of these, 'Romeo and Juliet' and 'Macbeth,' and is doubtless the outcome of tenfold the labor. A variorum edition of it, harvesting and gleaning, as Mr. Furness does, the literature not only of England, but of Germany and France, and storing all away in two volumes of this size, might be the work of a lifetime. . . . Mr. Furness has found it necessary to construct a text for himself by collation and comparison of the others. He has done it with admirable judgment and care, and given a good, conservative text in modern spelling and printing. . . . Then come notes grammatical and explanatory. These are presented with admirable brevity and clearness, and are occasionally enlivened and enlightened by pithy remarks of the editor, all too few. . . . The second volume, under the name of an appendix, presents the student with a collection of documents and critical discussions too extended to be placed in immediate connection with the text. . . . Most students would have been glad to see this volume larger, but all will recognize the excellent judgment with which the selections have been made and the fidelity and art of the translations. Beyond all question, the work furnishes important facilities for the study of this great poem."—F. A. MARCH: Nation, xxv. 272.

"The present volumes abound in special difficulties of their own, not the least of which spring from the extraordinary number and extent of the discussions upon so many points connected with the play. A glance at the bibliography of 'Hamlet,' printed at the end of the second volume, would strike the nervelessness of despair into any editor not fortified by the intensest love of the author and of the work. . . . Mr. Furness is to be congratulated on the completion of the most difficult, the most important, and the most interesting of all the volumes of his series." Spectator, li. 249.

4. Vol. v., King Lear, 1880.

"Mr. Furness gives us the substance of a hundred volumes in one. It contains a critical text, with all the various readings and interpretations and explanatory notes from the beginning to the present time, with the criticisms and comments of all kinds, lexical, grammatical, æsthetical, and the rest. Mr. Furness works with more ease and expresses his own opinions more freely than in his former volumes, and this is a gain. In an appendix there are discussions of the date of composition, the sources of the plot, the actors, the costume; extended passages of English, German, and French criticism; a good bibliography, and an index. . . . There is no book to be compared with it; it is indispensable to every student of Shakspere."—Nation, xxxi. 327.

"Slowly but surely the great task undertaken by America of providing an edition of Shakspeare authoritative as regards text and exhaustive in respect of comment advances. . . . It is pleasant to have in one volume the utterances of men like Coleridge, Johnson, Lamb, and other critics and commentators upon Lear, together with a full record of the views that have been taken by actors like Kean or Devrient."—Ath., No. 2751.

"This edition of 'King Lear' strikes us as, for all practical purposes, perfect. . . . The river of text flows between broad meadows and park-lands of annotation. A series of appendices swells out the volume to portly, though by no means unwieldy, dimensions. Yet we have hardly met with a superfluous or irrelevant sentence. . . . Not only is the text as printed the result of exhaustive critical research, not only is every plausible emendation, every pertinent comment, inserted in the foot-notes, but we have separate essays on the date of composition, the source of the plot, the duration of the action, the costumes of the characters, and so on. We are told what mad-doctors have thought of the insanity of Lear, and how celebrated actors have personated him on the stage. An exceedingly interesting and useful selection is given of opinions by English, American, and German critics; a list of the editions collated, and another of the books that have been written on the play, present a bird's-eye view of the literature of the subject; and the whole is wound up with what no such volume should be without, an index. All this might have been done with a mere result of ponderousness,—an imposing and appalling display of 'such reading as is never read.' But Dr. Furness's hand is light, and strong common sense is his effectual safeguard from pedantry."—Spectator, liii. 1069.

5. Vol. vi., Othello, 1886. (In this volume and the following the text is that of the first folio.)

"Mr. Furness's own opinions are always valuable. In the majority of cases he accepts the simplest reading. Now and then, dazzled as all appear to be who meet too earnestly and too long the rays of Shakspeare, he undergoes some apparent hallucination. As a rule, however, he is the surest as well as the most indefatigable of commentators and editors. The position of his work is already monumental."—Ath., No. 3069.

6. Vol. vii., The Merchant of Venice, 1888.

"The text of the first folio, pure and simple, with all its errors and difficulties, is accepted, and the various readings of the four folios and the four quartos, with those of subsequent editions, are given at the foot. This course is the most sensible that can be adopted. . . . In the appendix, which occupies nearly half the volume, are given the materials bearing upon the date and origin of the plot, comments on the duration of the action, critical opinions, and much other matter of interest. . . . Like the previous volumes, this latest addition to the slowly-augmenting series is a model of scholarship and sanity, the latter a rarer gift in the case of Shakspearian editors than the former."—Ath., No. 3185.

7. Vol. viii., As You Like It, 1890.

"In what is called 'The Variorum Edition of Shakespeare,' America has the honour of having produced the very best and most complete edition, so far as it has gone, of our great national poet. For text, illustration, (happily not pictorial,) commentary, and criticism, it leaves nothing to be desired. The editor . . . combines with the patience and accuracy of the textual scholar an industry which has overlooked nothing of value that has been written about Shakespeare by the best German and French as well as English commentators and critics; and, what is of no less moment, he possesses in himself a rare delicacy of literary appreciation and breadth of judgment, disciplined by familiarity with all that is best in the literature of antiquity as well as of modern times, which he brings to bear on his notes with great effect. . . . It will say little for the intelligence of any one who chooses to profit by the labours of Mr. Furness over this play, if he does not rise from his book with a quickened appreciation of the dramatist's genius, and an intimate knowledge of the varied characters by which the action of the play is carried on."—Blackwood's Magazine, September, 1890.

"In this little book there is much to recall the best features of Dr. Furness's early writings; and though, of course, we do not in the least concur in Dr. Furness's peculiar theology, or no-theology, (which is, perhaps, what he would prefer to have attributed to him,) no one can read even this little volume without feeling that he gains a fresher insight into the scenes with which Dr. Furness is dealing."—Spectator, lviii. 185.

Gallenga, Antonio Carlo Napoleone, [ante, vol. ii., under pseudonyme of L. Mariotti, add.,] b. 1810, at Parma; educated at the University of Parma; left Italy in consequence of political troubles in 1831, and after spending some years in France, Malta, &c., and two years in the United States, settled in England in 1839 and became a naturalized British subject. During the greater part of this period he bore the assumed name of L. Mariotti, under which he published the works mentioned ante, vol. ii., and supported himself by teaching and by literature; but he subsequently adopted the profession of journalism, acting as special correspondent of the Times in Spain, Russia, &c., and as its leading editorial writer on foreign affairs, a position from which he retired in 1878. He was chargé d'affaires for Piedmont to the German Confederation 1848–49, and a member of the Piedmontese and of the Italian parliament 1854–64. 1. History of Piedmont, Lon., 1855, 3 vols. 8vo.

"Mr. Gallenga is neither brilliant in narration nor very dexterous in the use of materials; but he is earnest, sensible, and painstaking. . . . An occasional un-English expression merely proves that it is the genuine work of the author."—Sat. Rev.

"The Pearl of the Antilles . . . means Cuba in that peculiar language in which the titles of books are generally written . . . Mr. Gallenga's account of Cuba is, however, interesting, whatever its title."—Sat. Rev., xxxvi. 381.

6. Italy Revisited, Lon., 1875, 2 vols. 8vo.

"Mr. Gallenga's two volumes are as distinctly superior to the usual newspaper correspondent's platitudes as they are free from the egotistical garrulities with which tourists, and especially tourists in Italy, have made us familiar."—Ath., No. 2508.

"Tells us exactly the things that every one wishes to know, and about which it is so hard to get definite information."—Acad., ix. 92.

7. Two Years of the Eastern Question, Lon., 1877, 2 vols. 8vo.

"Apart from political and personal controversy, Mr. Gallenga's reminiscences of the East are both agreeable and instructive."—Sat. Rev., xliv. 270.

8. The Pope and the King: the War between Church and State in Italy, Lon., 1879, 2 vols. 8vo.

"His first volume is the best account of Modern Italian history which exists in English. It is written with the full knowledge of European politics which alone can make the subject intelligible. . . . The second part of Mr. Gallenga's book is unworthy of being appended to the first. The final reflections on the political future of Italy are interesting and suggestive; but, like most criticisms of modern politics, they are strong only in destruction."—M. "We have read few books more worthy to be read than this autobiography. . . . There is no gossip in it, not much anecdote, and little humour, though a great deal of sarcasm, veiled and expressed; but from beginning to end there is hardly a dull page."—Spectator, lviii. 728.

14. Jenny Jennett: a Tale without a Murder, Lon., 1886, 2 vols. cr. 8vo. 15. Italy, Present and Future, Lon., 1887, 2 vols. 8vo.

"For the most part his book is a long diatribe against the Italian people for their misuse of the power and liberty they have attained. . . . These volumes afford abundant proof that years have robbed their author of none of his cunning. Every page displays keen observation and vigorous thought; the writer often provokes opposition, but never induces weariness."—Spectator, lxi. 59.

2. Our Home by the Adriatic, Lon., 1886, 8vo; 2d ed. same year.

"The author has lived for twelve years in a part of the country that foreigners rarely visit, and has mixed freely in a society which they hardly ever enter. . . . She confines herself to her subject, the social conditions around her; and . . . her book not only makes capital reading, but also affords valuable material for those who desire to form a clear conception of the real life of modern Italy."—*Sat. Galton, Francis, F.R.S., b. 1822; son of S. T. Galton, of Duddeston, near Birmingham, Eng., grandson of Dr. Erasmus Darwin, (q. v., ante, vol. i.,) and cousin of Charles Darwin, supra; studied medicine at Birmingham Hospital, and at King's College, London, and graduated at Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1844. In 1846 he travelled in North Africa and on the White Nile, and in 1850, accompanied by C. J. Andersson, supra, he made an exploration of the then unknown Damara and Ovampo Lands in South Africa. He at first attached himself to meteorology, and was appointed a member of a committee of the board of trade, which concerned itself with the administration of the Meteorological Office; but he is best known through his researches into the laws of heredity. He has contributed to periodicals, is an active member of the British Association and of other learned societies, and in 1885–86 was president of the Anthropological Society. 1. "Mr. Francis Galton has bestowed immense pains upon the empirical proof of a thesis which from its intrinsic nature can never be proved empirically. . . . Until we can do infinitely more towards sorting the stores of man's mental growth and experience into what he brings into the world and what he draws from his subsequent surroundings in the world, our minds are in no condition for even the first shadowy conception of a 'law of heredity.'"—Sat. Rev., xxviii. 832.

8. English Men of Science: their Nature and Nurture, Lon., 1874, 8vo.

"His present aim has been, not so much to prove that scientific ability has a strong tendency to be hereditary, but to discover by an elaborate inductive process what are the leading conditions that go to the making of scientific men,—among which conditions innate disposition is shown to occupy a prominent place. . . . It is almost certain that no great results can be obtained from such a method as that which Mr. Galton has adopted."—J. S. Cotton: Acad., vii. 92.

Gardiner, Samuel Rawson, M.A., b. 1829, at Ropley, Hampshire; educated at Winchester College, and at Christ Church, Oxford, where he took a first class in 1851 and became senior student and afterwards honorary student of his college. He held for several years the chair of modern history at King's College, London, which he resigned in 1885. In 1882 he was awarded a civil-list pension in recognition of his historical labors, and in 1884 was elected Fellow of All Souls, Oxford. 1. (Ed.) Parliamentary Debates in 1610. "The picturesque style of historical writing has been so much overdone of late that it is a relief to get back to some one who jogs along quietly and leisurely, as people did in the last century,—never brilliant, but never ridiculous or offensive. Mr. Gardiner's sedateness is, however, too much for us. He might surely have made more of an age which saw our greatest poet and our greatest philosopher."—Sat. Rev., xv. 540.

"That which strikes us as most noteworthy in this important contribution to English history is the clearness with which the book, as a whole, brings out a fact less habitually insisted upon than the constitutional significance of the Parliamentary struggles of those times. As the downfall of the personal authority of James I. had been due to the central and typical scheme of his foreign policy, so the failure of the foreign policy of Buckingham and Charles I. was an important element in the want of confidence which was the real cause of the overthrow of the Stuart monarchy."—*Sat. "What makes him pre-eminently trustworthy as an authority is that he abstains from treating events and the actors in them from any particular point of view; that, at the risk of giving his narrative an occasionally disjointed appearance, he enables the reader to see different courses of events (Scotch, for instance, and English) in progress side by side, now converging, and now intersecting; and that in the deed he never forgets the nature of the doer, be he King Charles or King Pym."—Sat. Rev., liii. 429.

"Mr. Gardiner's principal achievement, I take it, is the luminous explanation he has given of the rise of the Cavalier party and of that division which, growing up in the heart of Parliament during the autumn of 1641, led to the disastrous Civil War."—J. R. SEELEY: Acad., xxi. 35.

"We greatly mistake if in Mr. Gardiner's 'History of England' our times have not produced a work destined to teach many a generation after them the true historical antecedents and conditions of the greatest political struggle through which our nation has passed."—Sat. Rev., lvi. 472.

18. Historical Biographies, Lon., 1884, cr. 8vo. 19. The History of the Great Civil War, 1642–1649: vol. i., 1642–1644, Lon., 1886, 8vo.

"Excellent as his earlier volumes have been, he seems to us to rise with his subject; he invests the chief actors in his story with greater life, and the scenes he describes with more reality, than before. . . . Although the story of the Civil War itself is told minutely, it is made wonderfully clear."—Sat. Rev., lxii. 813.

"Mr. Gardiner does not encourage the dream that haunted the English mind through the first half of this century,—the dream of a grand epic narrative, a sort of Iliad of English history, at the same time sublime and moral, of which Charles I., Strafford, Pym, Hampden, Falkland, and Cromwell should be the heroes. It is evident that he repudiates not only the party view of that period, but also the poetical view. He rejects alike the rhetoric of Macaulay and the poetry of Carlyle. He replaces their poetry by prose, and tells with scrupulous exactness a story which leaves us somewhat bewildered and rather saddened than animated. For Mr. Gardiner is serious."—J. R. SEELEY: Acad, xxxi. 353.

"If the art of historical narration consists in so handling one's materials that the reader shall see things happening in their proper sequence, and shall understand how they came to happen, Mr. Gardiner possesses the art in no common degree. Having a strong grasp of all the facts himself, he tells the complex story firmly, clearly, and coherently, dropping one thread for a time without forgetting it, and always bringing it in again at the right moment. From first to last the reader finds himself really interested, and can yet note that the interest is of that satisfactory and full-bodied kind which is produced, not by brilliant devices of style or eccentric methods, but by genuine and orderly information as to men and events, communicated by one who has made himself at home among them through the records. The style is deliberate, grave, and manly, with no sentence dull or purposeless, and every now and then a passage of energy and heightened tone. . . . The only question is whether . . . his impartiality does not pass too much into the guise of unnecessary coolness. In the English past of two hundred and fifty years ago, if not at dates much farther back, may not the strictest modern historian discern the tendencies that had most of the right in them, most of potential virtue and nobleness for the future, and, while acknowledging anything of merit in other tendencies, may he not attach himself preferably to those?"—DAVID MASSON: Acad., vii. 236.

"For grasp of situation and desire to set everything in its proper light, for perception of motives and the wise use of evidence, for accuracy, honesty, and exhaustive treatment, Mr. Gardiner stands alone."—Spectator, li. 699.

With MULLINGER, J. BASS, Introduction to the Study of English History, Lon., 1881, p. 8vo; 2d ed., 1882.

"Made up of what are in fact two distinct works. . . . The second part of this book . . . contains a treatise on the authorities, contemporary and non-contemporary, of English history. This is the production of Mr. Mullinger. . . . Mr. Gardiner himself contributes the essay which precedes Mr. Mullinger's work. . . . Mr. Gardiner supplies an admirable general idea of English history, as it presents itself to his mind. Mr. Mullinger puts the inquirer in the way of forming, if he so chooses, an opinion of his own."—Sat. Rev., lii. 331.

Quatre Bras, Ligny, and Waterloo: a Narrative of the Campaign in Belgium, 1815, Bost., 1882, 8vo.

"It is, perhaps, the most complete narrative of the Waterloo campaign that has yet appeared. It is, of course, in great measure a compilation; . . . but it is well worked up, and the reader will find it no mere piece of mosaic."—Nation, xxxiv. 427.

"Not only a mere narrative of the campaign, but also an acute and exhaustive criticism has been culled by Mr. Gardner from the best authorities, and both have been well put together. . . . In order to thoroughly exhaust Waterloo literature, Mr. Gardner devotes a chapter to 'Waterloo Poetry,' a good deal of which is sad stuff and might well have been omitted."—Ath., No. 2856.

"Although the treatise . . . is primarily a biography, and a very full and minute one, and although it is written with the reverential admiration of children rather than from the point of view of a dispassionate and critical historian, it is also virtually a history of the anti-slavery struggle. . . . It cannot be adequately dealt with till the later volumes are before us. . . . All that need now be done is to call attention to the mass of valuable materials which the biographers of Garrison have provided for historical inquirers. . . . Nearly all appear in print for the first time. Many relate to forgotten controversies, others serve chiefly to illustrate Garrison's character and that of his fellow-workers. But there are also many which throw a full and clear light on the condition of America, and especially of New England, five or six decades back."—JAMES BRYCE: Historical Review, No. 1.

Gaskell, Mrs. Elizabeth Cleghorn, 1810–1865, [ante, vol. i., add.,] b. in Cheyne Walk, Chelsea, was not, as stated ante, vol. i., Miss Stromkin, but was the daughter of William Stevenson, (q. v., ante, vol. ii,) who at the time of her birth was keeper of the records to the treasury. Her mother having died in giving her birth, she was brought up by her aunt, Mrs. Lumb, at the village of Knutsford, in Cheshire,—the "Cranford" of her popular story of that name. After spending two years at a school at Stratford-on-Avon, she lived with her father till his death in 1829, and afterwards at Knutsford, till her marriage in 1832 to Rev. William Gaskell, a Unitarian minister of Manchester. Some years later she turned her attention to writing, and contributed an account of Clopton Hall to William Howitt's Remarkable Places, and some short stories to the People's Journal. After the publication of Mary Barton she visited London and made the acquaintance of Dickens and other literary men, and became a contributor to Household Words. During the cotton famine in 1862 Mrs. Gaskell started sewing-schools for the female mill-hands, thus inaugurating a system of relief which was afterwards publicly adopted and proved of great benefit. Her death took place suddenly, of heart-disease, while staying at a house in Hampshire which she had recently bought as a present for her husband. Her novel Wives and Daughters, which was coming out at the time in serial form, was left unfinished. The following list of her works includes those mentioned ante, vol. i., where dates, &c., are not given: 1. Mary Barton: a Tale of Manchester Life, Lon., 1848, 2 vols. p. 8vo. Anon. (The 5th ed., 1854, contains Two Lectures on the Lancashire Dialect, by Rev. William Gaskell.) 2. The Moorland Cottage. By the Author of Mary Barton. Lon., 1850, fp. 8vo. 3. "No one would dream of ranking Mrs. Gaskell as a novelist beside Dickens or Thackeray, but she deserves a very high place among those who are comparatively unambitious in their efforts, and who, having a just measure of their own powers, succeed perfectly in what they undertake. She never attempted high flights, but pursued her way steadily and surely at a moderate elevation. Her style has not the magnificent reach of her friend Charlotte Brontë: it is homely, as suited her subjects. It was natural that art such as hers, working earnestly within a definite field, without straining to get beyond it, and never wasting its strength against the precipices, should become more perfect as she went on. . . . To the last she was best known as the authoress of 'Mary Barton.' . . . But in her later novels, 'Sylvia's Lovers' and 'Wives and Daughters,' in which she left the manufacturing towns behind her and essayed to describe less oppressive and painful conditions of life, though she cannot be said to have improved upon the completeness and vividness of her separate portraits, she showed greater art in the management of her story. . . . Her last novel, 'Wives and Daughters,' though she did not live to write the concluding chapters, is in many respects the most mature, as it is. with the exception, perhaps, of Cranford, the most delightful, of her works."—W. "It is a new story, which it was impossible to tell even a few years ago with anything like accuracy, simply because the original evidences had not been made sufficiently accessible. or comprehensively catalogued in true chronological order. But, although the author is a monk, and dedicates his work to Pope Leo XIII., by whom, it appears, he was induced to undertake it, he need fear no contradiction hereafter on the main point here revealed. The old scandals, universally discredited at the time, and believed in by a later generation only through prejudice and ignorance, are now dispelled forever, and no candid Protestant will ever think of reviving them."—JAMES GAIRDNER: Acad., xxxiii. 125.

Geddes, James. The History of the Administration of John de Witt, Grand Pensionary of Holland: vol. i., 1623–1654, Lon., 1879, 8vo.

"If Mr. Geddes has been fired by the honourable ambition of worthily carrying on the thread of Mr. Motley's labours, the conception of the 'History of the Administration of John de Witt' is not thedess its author's own, and his grasp of the general European history of the times with which he deals is, to say the least, as vigorous as that exhibited in the rather disappointing second volume of the 'Life and Death of John of Barneveld.' We cannot, however, suppress a wish that Mr. Geddes had not thought it necessary to imitate Mr. Motley—or rather, perhaps, the inimitable old master who is primarily responsible for the fashion to which we refer—in adopting the familiarly picturesque style of historical composition. . . . For English readers this volume is likely to possess a unique interest, centring in its narrative of what may assuredly be termed the strangest diplomatic negotiation into which this country has ever entered with a foreign power. We do not know whither else to turn for so plain and succinct an account as that furnished in Mr. Geddes's pages of the great Protestant and Republican scheme of an Anglo-Dutch coalition."—Sat. Rev., xlix. 283.

"We feel, with Mr. Geddes, that 'if there had been a Boswell by' De Witt's 'side, or a chatty French memoir-writer, we should have seen it all very differently.' As there was not, we think it a pity that so good a writer should have wasted his time on such an unprofitable subject."—Spectator, liii. 336.

Geikie, James, LL.D., F.R.S., b. 1839; brother of Archibald Geikie, supra; received a similar education to his brother's; served on the Geological Survey of Scotland from 1861 to 1882, and was then appointed Murchison professor of geology and mineralogy in Edinburgh University. He has prepared many geological maps and reports for the Geological Survey. 1. The Great Ice Age and its Relation to the Antiquity of Man, Lon., 1874, 8vo; 2d ed., rev., 1876.

"It is Mr. Geikie's plan to blend in one great result the special evidences which have been adduced by geologists and archæologists to prove the great antiquity of our race. The larger part of the work is naturally devoted to the phenomena of glacial action, as shown by a careful study of the deposits. . . . His studies have now brought his mind to the conclusion that none of the palæolithic series of gravels are post-glacial, but that all must be relegated to pre-glacial or inter-glacial times. . . . His book will mark an epoch in the scientific study of the Ice Age."—Sat. Rev., xxxvii. 247, 312.

"In 'Prehistoric Europe' Professor Geikie goes necessarily over much of the ground traversed not long ago by Professor Boyd Dawkins in 'Prehistoric Man in Britain,' the wider scope of the survey bringing at the same time more systematically under view the relations between our existing island group and the continent of which it once no doubt formed a part. The general agreement between these eminent palæontologists may be taken by the public at large as a sufficient testimony to the solidity of the basis on which has been built up the comparatively recent science of prehistoric archæology, and to the trustworthiness both of the materials and the methods which have been combined to make up the fabric."—*Sat. George, Henry, b. 1839, in Philadelphia; went to California in 1858, and afterwards became a journalist. In 1880 he removed to New York. In 1881 he visited Ireland and England, and in 1883–84 again visited England and Scotland at the invitation of the English Land Reform Union, making speeches on the land question. At the invitation of the Scottish Land Restoration League he returned in the following year to Great Britain, and produced a strong effect by his speeches. In 1886 he was the candidate of the United Labor Party for mayor of New York, but was not elected. He is editor of the Standard, a weekly paper published in New York. 1. Our Land and Land Policy, National and State, San Fran., 1871, 8vo. 2. The Subsidy Question and the Democratic Party, San Fran., 1871, 8vo. 3. Progress and Poverty: an Inquiry into the Cause of Industrial Depressions and of Increase of Want with Increase of Wealth: the Remedy, N. York, 1880, 8vo; Lon., 1881; new ed., 1884.

"Mr. George endeavors to show that the cause, or principal cause, of poverty and wretchedness in the midst of wealth and abundance in the world is the private ownership of land, whereby a few persons are enabled to exact from the many a rental for the use of something which is limited in quantity and indispensable to the human race. . . . Although we have to consider Mr. George's positions essentially unsound, we find many admirable passages, and a notable spirit of candor pervading his work. The style is for the most part engaging, and often eloquent. So far from being a work of communistic tendencies, the reader will find in it arguments to overthrow nearly all the communist theories of the present day."—Nation, xxxi. 65, 117.

(For replies to "Progress and Poverty," by the Duke of Argyll, Baron Bramwell, F. J. Bruce, I. B. Cooke, A. Crump, G. B. Dixwell, W. H. Mallock, J. Taylor, A. Toynbee, and F. The Land Question: what it is, and how only it can be settled, Lon., 1883, 12mo. 6. Social Problems, Chic., N. York, and Lon., 1884, p. 8vo.

"This is 'Progress and Poverty' over again, with less argument and more passion, less political economy and more tirade and bombast. We do not underestimate the evils which Mr. George depicts, but his remedy for them is as worthless and futile as it would be atrocious if it could be carried into execution. . . . In his present work he advocates woman suffrage, and frankly avows socialistic views. . . . Mixed up with all his absurdities there are dashes of sturdy good sense in all Mr. George's writings. . . . Barring a few slight blemishes of diction, ('will' for 'shall,' etc.,) his style is in every respect admirable. His method of developing a subject greatly resembles that of Herbert Spencer; . . . but Mr. George's style is fresher and more brilliant."—Nation. xxxviii. 237, and xxxix. 294.

"Throughout his book there runs a vein of cheerful optimism; of the cynicism and scepticism which mark so many of the revolutionary class there is scarcely a trace. Nor can we agree with those who think that Mr. George's pet idea, which here reappears, of the nationalization of land by the confiscation of rent, is a dangerous one. In a country like ours such a proposal is so extravagant and unpractical that it may be dismissed as harmless. The real danger seems to be . . . that the colossal blunder of Mr. George may hide from us the valuable truths or suggestions of truth that may undoubtedly be found in the book."—Acad., xxv. 87.

"Mr. George is the master of a clear and vigorous style, and although he looks almost exclusively at the darker side of things, although his denunciations of modern society are unduly severe, his facts often unfairly stated, and his deductions generally absurd, many of his observations are not without warrant; and it is perhaps well that we should be reminded, even in overstrained language, that our social system is not perfect, and that some momentous social problems are pressing for solution."—Spectator, lvii. 923.

7. Protection or Free Trade: an Examination of the Tariff Question: with Especial Regard to the Interests of Labour, N. York and Lon., 1886, 12mo.

"The most interesting parts of his book are the chapters in which he explains where the real strength of protection lies; it is in the assumption that 'the getting of work, not the getting of the result of work,' is the end to which national policy should be directed. In following out this idea he discusses the matter in a way that is both fresh and suggestive."—Ath., No. 3065.

"A book which is to be commended for the labour bestowed upon it, but which can hardly find much favour outside the families of the descendants of the sergeant-at-arms to Gulielmus Conquistor."—Ath., No. 2421.

"It is, under the disguise of a family history, an attempt to construct a family, and establish a title to a baronetcy, which would be at once rejected if presented to any competent court. . . . There are a good many baronets, especially in Scotland, with dubious titles; but none of them, so far as we know, has fallen upon Dr. Gibb's device of supporting them by the publication of biographies of imaginary ancestors."—Æ. "All these second presentations of a well-known story, these aftergrowths from an old-established stem, are mistakes in themselves, and more likely than not to be weak and unsatisfactory. We cannot, however, say this of the first volume of 'Robin Gray,' almost the whole of which has been worked with great delicacy and skill, and which is as good for the kind of thing as can be."—Sat. Rev., xxvii. 463.

4. For Lack of Gold, Lon., 1871, 3 vols.; new ed., 1881.

"Mr. Gibbon has committed the same mistake in 'For Lack of Gold' which spoilt the thoroughness of 'Robin Gray;' that is, he has begun with a sweet and tender idyl, and has suffered himself to wander off into unlikely and unreal sensationalism. He evidently misapprehends both his own powers and the taste of the more cultivated class of readers, whom he could better interest than the coarser kind, and, instead of working out his vein of pure ore, goes into the manufacture of a base and spurious metal, which is not refined enough for the best judges and not showy enough for the worst."—*Sat. "Mr. Gilbert seems to have spent some time in consulting the public records of Ferrara, and especially those which have reference to the life and times of Lucrezia Borgia; and his labour has resulted in a curious picture of the city as it was between three and four centuries ago, and a very interesting study of the character of a princess who has hitherto found but few champions. The idea originally thrown out by Mr. Roscoe, in his 'Dissertation on the Character of Lucretia Borgia,' has been fully worked out by Mr. Gilbert, who has at least succeeded in proving that the beautiful toxicologist of the stage has very little in common with the Lucrezia Borgia of history."—*Sat. "He is a story-teller sui generis, with a very peculiar tendency towards minute analysis of morbid and exceptional mental processes. Yet he never seems to analyze any mood or mental condition for its own sake simply; and we are therefore compelled to see in him the professed moralist with a leaning towards hard psychological phenomena, in which he finds a ready justification for his didactic purpose. . . . The fusing power is what Mr. Gilbert is most lacking in. He sees his whole subject clearly enough from the pseudo-scientific ground, but he does not so see it from the elevated table-land of the imagination. . . . All Mr. Gilbert's books are full of exquisite pictures and individual points, which are vastly unlike those found in the books of any one else."—Contemp. Rev., xii. 437-444.

Rossetti.) Enlarged Edition, with Additional Letters and a Memoir of the Author, 1880.

"In the very interesting Life before us tardy justice has at last been done to the memory of one whose natural gifts qualified him apparently to rank amongst the greatest of English artists. Mr. Gilchrist's book both tells the singular story of Blake's life, for the first time, with fulness and with a judgment which is rarely at fault, and by its numerous and faithful illustrations enables the reader more or less to make acquaintance with the artist. . . The book is written in a clear, vigorous, unconventional style; it is as amusing as a romance, and we have few recent Lives in which the facts have been more carefully collected, presented with less parade, or arranged in such lucid order. The catalogue of drawings which has been added by Mr. William Rossetti is a model of what is an indispensable adjunct to an artist's life."—Sat. Rev., xvi. 650.

"The great fact of the book, both in Mr. Rossetti's preface, in the Life, and in the subjoined essays by Mr. Gilchrist, is her advocacy of the merits of Walt Whitman. . . . The book is destined to form a readable chapter in the history of the Rossetti group, which is sure to be an important episode of our century in literature and art."—Nation, xliv. 476.

Gilder, Richard Watson, LL.D., b. 1844, in Bordentown, N.J.; was educated mainly in a school kept by his father, Rev. W. H. Gilder. In 1865 he joined the staff of the Newark (N.J.) Advertiser, and in 1868 aided in establishing the Newark Morning Register. In 1869 he became editor of Hours at Home, soon afterwards merged in Scribner's Monthly, now the Century, of which he was made assistant editor. In 1881 he succeeded Dr. Holland as editor-in-chief. 1. The New Day: a Poem, in Songs and Sonnets, N. York, 1876, 16mo; new ed., 1880.

"There is sincerity of emotion, delicacy of expression, seriousness of intention, and artistic capacity enough in Mr. Gilder's verses to give ground for hope that, with large experience and faithful culture, he will write such poetry as will add preciousness even to these first works of his muse."—Nation, xxii. 14.

"'The New Day,' a series of love-sonnets and short lyrics, deserves recognition for mastery of rhythm, for refinement of culture, and for a daintiness of expression which, if not due to imagination, has the subtle flavour of art."—Spectator, lix. 263.

2. The Poet and his Master, and other Poems. Illust. N. York, 1878, 12mo. 3. Lyrics, and other Poems, N. York, 1885, 16mo. 4. Poems, in Three Parts: 1. The New Day; 2. The Celestial Passion; 3. Lyrics, N. York, 1887. (Complete edition, including some poems not previously published.)

"He stands clearly the first in promise among the younger men to whom we must look to inherit the poetic laurels of Emerson and Longfellow."—Nation, xli. 540.

"There is no slovenly work in 'The New Day' and 'The Poet and his Master;' each is a cluster of flawless poems,—the earlier verse marked by the mystical beauty, intense emotion, and psychological distinctions of the select illuminati. . . . An individual tone dominates his maturer lyrical efforts."—E. C. STEDMAN: Poets of America, 442.

Gilder, William Henry, b. 1838, in Philadelphia, brother of R. W. Gilder, supra; served in the civil war, and was brevetted major at its close; accompanied Lieut. Schwatka on the expedition in search of Sir John Franklin in 1878, and in 1881, as correspondent of the New York Herald, accompanied the Rodgers expedition in search of the "Jeannette." He travelled across Siberia from Bering Strait in midwinter to telegraph news to Washington of the burning of the "Rodgers," and joined in the search on the Lena delta for survivors of the "Jeannette." 1. Schwatka's Search: Sledging in the Arctic in Quest of the Franklin Records. Illust. and Maps. N. York, 1881, 8vo.

"Colonel Gilder's book, giving as it does not merely interesting and minute details of the labours and sufferings of the heroic little band of explorers, but also much information about the manners and modes of life of various tribes of the Innuit people, is a valuable addition to what, it seems, is now comprehensively designated as 'Arcticology.'"—Spectator, lv. 1231.

2. Ice-Pack and Tundra: an Account of the Search for the "Jeannette" and a Sledge Journey through Siberia. Maps and Illust. N. York, 1883, 8vo.

"It is strictly a personal narrative, except such portions as are devoted to De Long's journal, the heroic journey of Ninderman and Noros, and the later movements of Melville in the delta of the Lena. . . . Some characteristic sketches of dwellers in northeast Siberia will be welcome to ethnologists."—Nation, xxxvi. 240.

"There is not a chapter in Mr. Gill's book that is not rich in valuable and interesting material."—Acad., x. 52.

2. Life in the Southern Isles; or, Scenes and Incidents in the South Pacific and New Guinea. Illust. Lon., 1876, 16mo; new ed., 1888.

"He has now condensed into a single volume the scattered notes of more than twenty years' experience. . . . Although the author writes primarily . . . from a missionary point of view, he is by no means a man of one idea, and has evidently abundance of material at his command." —Acad., x. 465.

3. Historical Sketches of Savage Life in Polynesia: with Illustrative Clan Songs, Wellington, New Zealand, 1880, 8vo.

"It is not, perhaps, so generally interesting as his previous work, the very remarkable 'Myths and Songs from the South Pacific,"—a collection of antiquities, to use the words of Professor Max Müller, 'showing us, far better than any stone weapons or stone idols, the growth of the human mind during a period which as yet is full of the most perplexing problems to the psychologist, the historian, and the theologian.' The 'Historical Sketches' deal with the rough realities more than with the picturesque fictions of savage life, and the work is somewhat monotonous in its records of sacrifices to fierce gods, its legends of internecine feuds, and its chronicles of cannibalism. But the testimony it bears has the great merit of being quite trustworthy; and Mr. Gill has done very good service by placing on record the heathenish traditions which must before long fade from the memories of the Christian descendants of the fierce islanders to whom they relate."—Sat. Rev., l. 649.

"I hope the book will have as many readers as its predecessor. If that told us what the untrained human mind thinks about the universe and its government, this one shows us what human life and society can be where each man does that which is right in his own eyes."—A. H. SAYCE: Acad., xix. 55.

"In this work . . . I have endeavoured to embody the greater part of the results at which I arrived in the 'Studies on Homer and the Homeric Age,' 1858. Those results, however, are considerably modified in the ethnological and in the mythological portions of the inquiry."—Extract from Preface.

"There is great inequality in Mr. Gladstone's execution of his undertaking. On some parts of it he has bestowed the greatest pains, and his views are undoubtedly worthy of the deepest consideration, while on others he has apparently taken up the slight conjectures of others, and applied to them too small a share of the extraordinary powers of his own mind."—*Sat. "The real thing which Mr. Gladstone objects to is not the doctrine that the Catholic faith on any disputed point of pure theology may be ascertained from a declaration (uttered under certain conditions) by the Pope, instead of the cumbrous machinery, used probably for the last time in 1870, of a group of hundreds of bishops summoned away for months from their dioceses to be cajoled into voting straight; he is shocked at finding that English and Irish, French and American, German and Italian Catholics are to be bound in conscience to obey the orders of an Italian Court, in certain matters about which the Governments of their own countries give, or claim the power to give, contradictory orders."—W. "Mr. Gledstone's skill and diligence have given us a biography of this extraordinary man which it is a positive pleasure to read. What his theological bias may be we do not care to inquire, only that he gives us plainly to understand that he admires Whitefield in spite of his Calvinism rather than in consequence of it. At any rate, he has favoured the world with a clear, spirited, and judicious life of one whose memory will ever be honoured by those who trace back to him and to men like-minded with him the first germs of that spiritual revival in England which, with all its drawbacks, has proved the source of happiness to thousands, and has powerfully affected for good our national life and character."—*Sat. Godkin, Georgina Sarah, daughter of James Godkin, infra. 1. Life of Victor Emmanuel II., First King of Italy, Lon. and N. York, 1879, 2 vols. p. 8vo.

"The writer's admiration for the truly kingly qualities of Victor Emmanuel amounts almost to the loyalty of a subject, which an evidently long residence in Italy has fostered. . . . The permanent value of this biography lies in its extracts from the chief Italian memoirs on the period under survey; . . . while its interest is secured by a good assortment of anecdotes."—Nation, xxix. 231.

"He has succeeded in compressing into the limits of two very handy volumes all the principal events of the public life of the late King of Italy. . . . His work is very far from being dull."—Spectator, lii. 1253.

"The book is disfigured throughout by the practice of filling the pages with scraps from other writers. . . . Mr. Godkin treats the three rival communions with praiseworthy impartiality, and is ready to do justice to good and zealous men in all three alike. . . . He is strong in behalf of the National system and the Queen's Colleges. . . . Mr. Godkin is much better employed in speaking of these later matters, which he has clearly looked at with much care, than in puzzling his brain about Cuthites and Fir-Bolgs."—Sat. Rev., xxxvi. 411.

"Mr. Godkin's book is in no wise to be relied on. . . . The aim of the work is not historical at all, but political and partisan."—JAMES GAIRDNER: Acad., v. 30.

The Pearl of the Antilles; or, An Artist in Cuba, Lon., 1873, p. 8vo.

"We recently reviewed a book by Mr. Gallenga called the 'Pearl of the Antilles.' . . . We are sorry to see . . . that some dispute exists between the publishers of the two volumes as to the right to the title. . . . As, however, the two authors had resolved upon the same name, it is almost a pity that they could not have gone further and agreed to combine their books. Mr. Gallenga visited Cuba as an intelligent observer of political phenomena. . . . Mr. Goodman, on the other hand, treats us to a purely picturesque account of Cuban life and manners. . . . We may admit that he presents us with a series of sufficiently lively pictures of life in the tropics."—Sat. Rev., xxxvi. 512.

Gordon, Maj.-Gen. Charles George, C.B., 1833–1885, b. at Woolwich, and educated at the Royal Military Academy; received his commission in the Royal Engineers in 1852; served in the Crimean war; joined the allied army in China in 1860, and in 1862–63, in command of a small force of natives, and recruits of all nations, known as the "Ever-Victorious Army," succeeded in suppressing the Taiping rebellion. Returning to England, he was appointed commanding royal engineer at Gravesend in 1865; in 1871–72 he acted as commissioner of the Danube at Galatz; in 1874 he was appointed by the Khedive governor of the Soudan tribes, a post which he resigned in 1876, but returned in 1877 as governor-general of the Soudan and the Equatorial Provinces. In 1880 he was appointed secretary to Lord Ripon in India, but resigned soon after reaching Bombay, and went to Hong-Kong on the invitation of the Chinese government to assist in bringing about an understanding between that country and Russia. He was appointed commanding royal engineer at Mauritius in 1881, major-general in the army and commander-in-chief of the Cape forces in 1882, visited Palestine in 1883, and in January, 1884, was sent as British envoy to Khartoum, and reappointed by the Khedive governor-general of the Soudan, with directions to bring away the garrisons hemmed in by the insurrectionists under the Mahdi. For three hundred and thirty-seven days he was shut up in Khartoum with scant provisions and a small and discontented garrison, and while the forces finally sent by the English government for his relief were on their way, Gordon was killed and the town surrendered. "In these Journals, begun after Gordon was left absolutely alone, we have his communings with himself; his statement and re-statement of his own position, as he conceived it; of the action, or inaction, of Mr. Gladstone's government, as he understood it. . . . It is needless to remark that the Journals contain certain of his curious speculations as to the nature of man and the government of the world."—Sat. Rev., lx. 21.

He visited Norway, Denmark, and Sweden in 1872 and 1874, and Holland in 1877, while studying the literature of those countries, and in 1884–85 lectured at the Lowell Institute at Boston and at Harvard and Yale Colleges and Johns Hopkins University. 1. "Mr. Gosse has been with the Lotus-eaters, and his song has the grateful, murmuring sound which reminds one of the softness and deliciousness of summer-time. . . . 6. New Poems, Lon., 1879, p. 8vo.

"Technically speaking, Mr. Gosse's 'New Poems' might be classed as idyls and lyrics; but the lyrical element preponderates. His songs, as a rule, are the expression of emotion rather than of passion. . . . It is one great charm of these verses that they seem to come to the poet uncalled, to be the natural and necessary expression of his mood. Yet natural as they are—so natural that, granted the intensity of emotion, the musical utterance follows like a logical conclusion—the artistic expression is never neglected."—*Sat. "Hitherto readers wishing to know all that Gray had written were forced to consult four distinct publications of various forms and sizes. Now all that it is possible to obtain of the poet's publications in prose and verse is inserted in these well-printed volumes. There are also some manuscript additions. . . . When an editor does his part as well as Mr. Gosse has done, the reviewer, having no errors to discover or omissions to lament, can but thank him for a task which could never have been achieved so perfectly without the most exact and persistent labour."—Ath., No. 2985.

From Shakspeare to Pope: an Inquiry into the Causes and Phenomena of the Rise of Classical Poetry in England, Cambridge, 1885, p. 8vo.

"The lectures published in this volume were delivered by Mr. Gosse as Clark Lecturer of Trinity College, Cambridge, . . . and they also have been read before several 'academic audiences' in America. . . . Mr. Gosse expresses the hope that he has been able to show that the classical movement was not a stupid decline into dulness, but that it was 'an absolute necessity, if English poetry was to exist, that a period of executive severity and attention to form should succeed the hysterical riot of the Jacobeans.' The process by which this conclusion is reached will interest every reader of poetry. . . . He has brought much to light that has been neglected hitherto, he abounds with suggestions, and when for a moment he is allured from his main line of argument by some poetic memory or illustration his talk is delightful."—Ath., No. 3030.

"It contains much new and interesting information, and embodies the research and the judgment of a scholar who knows his subject intimately. . . . But for those who were expecting to hear some authoritative word upon the literary revolution which cast down Shakspere and enthroned Pope, it is too much to find Mr. Gosse come forward smiling with sheets of anecdotical biography."—Acad., xxviii. 350.

(The accuracy of this book on certain points, and Mr. Gosse's knowledge of the subject, were impugned in an article by J. Churton Collins in the Quarterly Review, which called forth letters and articles in reply in the Spectator, lix. 1452, the Athenæum, No. 3080, &c.) 19. Firdausi in Exile, and other Poems, Lon., 1885, 18mo.

"Mr. Gosse's verse is so smooth and fluent that the reader is apt to forget how difficult it is to tell a story like this ['Firdausi'] in fifty-four stanzas, more difficult in rhyme arrangement than the ottava rima, inasmuch as one of the rhyme-sounds is repeated four times in the stanza. . . . Though the influence of Mr. Matthew Arnold is perhaps too apparent in the idyllic poems, such as 'A Ballad in the Upper Thames,' Mr. Gosse shows a true love of Nature and a true eye for her various moods."—Ath., No. 3039.

"It does not tell us much about Congreve personally, because there is little to tell; but it corrects some misconceptions, fills up some blanks, reduces some dates to accuracy, and gives us a just general conception of what Congreve was to his contemporaries; and, besides this, it sketches very completely the history of the stage during the poet's connection with it."—Nation, xlvii. 255.

"The author of a compendious history of any kind . . . should mentally address himself to two opposite classes of possible readers,—namely, those who are utterly ignorant of the subject of which he treats, and those to whom it is perfectly familiar. . . . Messrs. Gostwick and Harrison have very carefully consulted the wants of the two opposite classes to which we have referred, and consequently of the various classes which may be ranged on a graduated scale from one extreme to the other."—*Sat. Gould, Miss Jeanie T. See Lincoln, Mrs. Jeanie T., (Gould,) infra.

Gould, John, F.R.S., [ante, vol. i., add.,] 1804–1881. The catalogue of scientific papers compiled by the Royal Society shows that up to 1873 there had been two hundred and twenty-nine contributed by Gould, and this number was afterwards considerably increased. Of his vast collection of birds and mammals, the Australian birds are in the Academy of Natural Sciences, Philadelphia, and the humming-birds and Australian mammals in the South Kensington Museum. His books, which include more than forty folio volumes, now command enhanced prices for the beauty of their illustrations as well as for the value of the text. Most of them were originally published in parts. Add to the list given ante, vol. i.: 1. A Monograph of the Trochilidæ, or Family of Humming-Birds, 1849–61, 5 vols. imp. fol. Separate volume, entitled "An Introduction to the Trochilidæ, or Family of Humming-Birds," 1861, 8vo. Supplementary volume, completed by R. Bowdler Sharpe, 1886. 2. The Birds of Asia, Lon., 1850–83, 7 vols. imp. fol. (Vol. vii. was completed by R. B. Sharpe.) 3. The Birds of Great Britain, Lon., 1862–73, 5 vols. (25 parts) imp. fol. In the final volume the author writes in reference to the illustrations in his works,—

"Many of the public are quite unaware how the colouring of these large plates has been accomplished, and not a few believe that they are produced by some mechanical process, or by chromo-lithography. This, however, is not the case: every sky with its varied tints, and every feather of each bird, were coloured by hand; and when it is considered that nearly two hundred and eighty thousand illustrations in the present work have been so treated, it will cause some astonishment to those who give the subject a thought."

4. The Mammals of Australia, Lon., 1863, 3 vols. imp. fol. (The publication of this work in parts was begun in 1845, and parts i. and ii. are mentioned ante, vol. i.)

"Worthy to take its place as a companion to what we consider as the most complete of all Mr. Gould's undertakings, 'The Birds of Australia;' and the mammals of that distant land are now better illustrated, and their strange outlines more nearly brought home to us, as we turn over his magnificent plates, than those even of Europe itself."—Sat. Rev., xvii. 28.

5. Hand-Book to the Birds of Australia, Lon., 1865, 2 vols. 8vo. (This is a reissue of the letter-press in the seven volumes, folio, of Birds of Australia, ante, vol. i., of which a supplementary volume was published in 1869.) 6. The Birds of New Guinea and the Adjacent Papuan Islands: including any New Species that may be discovered in Australia, Lon., 1875–88, 5 vols. (25 parts) imp. fol. (This was left unfinished at the author's death, and was completed and edited by R. B. Sharpe, whose name, however, does not appear on the title-page.) 7. Monograph of the Pittidæ. Part I. Gould, Rev. Sabine Baring-, M.A., eldest son of Edward Baring-Gould, supra; b. 1834, at Exeter; graduated at Clare College, Cambridge, 1854; ordained 1864; curate of Horbury, Yorkshire, 1864–67; perpetual curate of Dalton, Yorkshire, 1867–71; rector of East Mersea, Essex, 1871–81, and since then of Lew-Trenchard, of which he is patron and lord of the manor. He edited The Sacristy, a quarterly review of ecclesiastical art and literature, from 1871 to 1873. His novels have appeared anonymously. 1. The Path of the Just: Tales of Holy Men and Children, Lon., 1857, 18mo. 2. Iceland: its Scenes and Sagas. Illust. and Map. Lon., 1863, r. 8vo.

"His sketches [from water-colours] are spirited and vivid; they give a lively notion of the wild and sullen scenery of Iceland. And the stories with which he varies his narrative are well told and racy."—Sat. Rev., xvii. 359.

"This is a rambling, oddly-written book showing a good deal of out-of-the-way research, though rather irregular and unequal, and some, though not a full, appreciation of the new teaching of Comparative Philology and Mythology."—Sat. Rev., xxv. 116.

6. The Silver Store: collected from Mediæval Christian and Jewish Mines, Lon., 1868, p. 8vo; 3d ed., rev., 1887. 7. Curiosities of Olden Times, Lon., 1869, fp. 8vo.

"He has the gift of telling a tale, and in its perfection this is a very rare gift indeed. . . . But if he can write like a French vaudevillist, Mr. Baring-Gould can do a good bit of stiff scholarship when it comes in his way, as when he traces through all its developments the tale that has furnished Longfellow with the framework of his 'King Robert of Sicily.'"—Sat. Rev., xxviii. 261.

8. The Golden Gate: a Complete Manual of Instructions, Devotions, and Preparations, Lon., 1869–70, 3 parts, 16mo. 9. The Origin and Development of Religious Belief: Mosaicism, Lon., 1869–70, 2 parts, 8vo; new ed., 1884. 10. In Exitu Israel: an Historical Novel, Lon., 1870, 2 vols. p. 8vo. 11. One Hundred Sermon-Sketches, for Extempore Preachers, Lon., 1871, p. 8vo; new ed., 1876. 12. Legends of Old Testament Characters; from the Talmud and other Sources, Lon., 1871, 2 vols. p. 8vo.

"If Mr. Baring-Gould's readers look for that critical or scientific treatment of legends of which his previous works gave good promise, they will, we fear, come to the conclusion that he has gone back rather than forward, and will experience the unpleasant feeling of being in the hands of a guide who shows himself uncertain as to the track which he ought to follow. . . . But while he [the reader] may regret that Mr. Baring-Gould has not done more with his materials, we will not deny their abundance, and it will be his own loss if he foregoes the pleasure and the profit of reading these entertaining volumes."—*Sat. "More than one of the chapters in these anything but dull volumes, which begin with the nobility, upper and lower, and end with a brief discourse on the stove, furnish abundant evidence that the author might have written a valuable as well as entertaining book had he but carefully followed the method clearly indicated by himself. . . . Our charge against him is only that of over-haste."—Sat. Rev., xlviii. 664.

"This work consists of a great deal of padding and a little original matter. The padding is from well-known, trustworthy German sources, and would be instructive enough in the hands of an author with a sufferable style, and sufficient personal command of his subject to allow him to make an intelligent use of his materials. . . . With care and patience he might help to scatter the utter dark, ness prevalent among us with respect to Germany.. His present work is not much more accurate, and it is less amusing, than the 'Pays des Milliards' of M. Tissot, which at least has all the merits of a regular caricature."—Acad., xvi. 385.

"He is never dry; he is never tedious. He is seldom wrong in his facts, still seldomer wrong in his inferences. If you let him take you by the hand, and follow his lead confidingly, you will get a very good bird's-eye view of a vast subject. But it is, after all, only a bird's-eye view."—Spectator, liii. 626.

NOTICES OF MR. BARING-GOULD'S NOVELS:

"Wild, singular, extraordinary, as the conceptions and combinations of the author of 'Mehalah' are, they are almost if not entirely removed from the realm of imagination. It is on this fact, as we believe, that their value and their chance of endurance as literature rest. The stories of English rural life which have followed 'Mehalah' form each in its way bits of human history, studies of eccentric development, scenes from the comedy of unsophisticated life, which have an interest different from what we accord to the flights of more exclusively imaginative writers."—Sat. Rev., lxiv. 667.

"Of our eight or ten living novelists of merit, few have greater ability than Mr. Baring-Gould. His characters are bold and forcible figures, his wit is as ready as his figures of speech are apt. He has a powerful imagination, and is quaintly fanciful. When he describes a storm one can see his trees breaking in the gale. So enormous and accurate is his general information that there is no trade or profession with which he does not seem to be familiar. So far as scientific knowlege is concerned, he is obviously better equipped than any contemporary writer of fiction. Yet one rises from his books with a feeling of repulsion, or at least with the glad conviction that his ignoble views of life are as untrue as the characters who illustrate them. Here is a melancholy case of a novelist, not only clever but sincere, undone by want of sympathy."—J. M. BARRIE: Contemporary Rev., February, 1890.

2. The Creed of Science, Religious, Moral, and Social, Lon., 1881, 8vo; 2d ed., rev., 1884.

"I propose in the following pages to give the chief conclusions reached by modern science in the central questions of religion, morals, and society,—to state, in a word, the general creed of science; and as the scientific faith may still be fallible, or of unequal degrees of credit, I propose, in the second place, to offer some comments and criticisms on some of its more doubtful articles, with a view to their reconsideration or revision."—Author's Preface.

"This volume shows in a very able as well as very interesting manner the poverty of the higher philosophy of the men of physical science, and the absolute need for something better than they can give us as the supplement of their own science, which is so excellent in itself. But it is a pity that the author, in his desire for maintaining close sympathy with the men of science, should have been so terribly afraid of being taken for a Christian."—Spectator, liv. 1194.

3. The Social Problem in its Economical, Moral, and Political Aspects, Lon., 1886, 8vo.

"With terrific power he depicts the purgatorial pains of poverty . . . What are his remedies? They are twofold,—general and special. The most comprehensive prescription is to 'try and see what justice, the great and almost the only social virtue, is, and where it lies.' . . . Unlike so many who have looked into the depths of the social abyss, he has not been seized with an intellectual vertigo. He has the moral earnestness without the bogus value-theory of Marx; the burning eloquence without the glaring fallacies of Henry George. . . . One feels that Prof. Graham may be the ablest living advocate of socialism; one wishes that he were less of an advocate and more of a judge."—F. Y. EDGEWORTH: Acad., xxx. 50.

Grant, Robert, Ph.D., b. 1852, in Boston, Mass.; graduated at Harvard in 1873, and at the Harvard Law School in 1879, and has since practised law in Boston. He has written occasional poems, including one on the two-hundred-and-fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Latin School, which was published with other exercises under the title of The Oldest School in America, Boston, 1885. 1. The Little Tin Gods-on-Wheels, Cambridge, Mass., 1879. Republished with Oxygen: a Mount Desert Pastoral. Illust. 1879, sq. 16mo. 2. The Confessions of a Frivolous Girl: a Story of Fashionable Life, Bost., 1880, 12mo.

"It is a trifle, and as 'A Story of Fashionable Life' has small title to profound regard. . . . No reader will fail to notice how happily the author has measured in it the frivolity which in a New York girl may be more than skin-deep, but does not penetrate beyond a strict rectitude and real dignity of character that disclose themselves . . . as soon as there is any real occasion."—Nation, xxxi. 83.

Grant, Thornley. The Moated Farm, Edin., 1861, p. 8vo.

Grant, Ulysses S., (originally Hiram Ulysses,)

1822–1885, b. at Point Pleasant, Clermont Co., O.: graduated at the U. S. Military Academy 1843; served as lieutenant in the Mexican war 1845–47; was promoted captain in 1853, but resigned his commission in 1854, and settled in Missouri; served in the civil war as colonel, brigadier-general, and major-general of volunteers 1861–63, and was then commissioned as major-general in the regular army; commissioned as lieutenant-general in 1864, with the command of all the armies, and as general 1866. He was President of the United States 1869–1877, and was restored to his rank as general and placed on the retired list shortly before his death. He died at Mount McGregor, near Saratoga, and was buried in Riverside Park, N.Y., the funeral cortége being the most imposing ever witnessed in America. Among the numerous biographies of him which have been published it is sufficient to refer to his Personal Memoirs, mentioned below, and the Military Life by Adam Badeau, q. v., supra. 1. Report of the Armies of the United States, 1864–65, N. York, 1865, 8vo. 2. Personal Memoirs, N. York, 1885–86, 2 vols. 8vo. (The sale of this work has exceeded three hundred thousand copies.)

"Looked at simply as material for the American historical magnum opus of the future, probably nothing will be reckoned more important, certainly nothing can be more interesting on the military side, than this plain narrative, by a plain, but observant, veracious, and resolutely impartial, man. . . . General Grant writes a simple, American-Saxon style."—Spectator, lix. 392.

"It cannot be too carefully remembered . . . that the chief value of the book must be in the revelation of Grant's own character, feelings, judgments, and modes of thinking. It is both valuable and interesting as making us know him better than we knew him before; but, regarded as history, all the circumstances under which it was written precluded the possibility of that critical testing of memory and comparison of voluminous documents without which not even so prominent an actor on the world's stage can safely claim to write the history of his own time."—Nation, xliii. 12.

"His biographer is one familiar with him from the early days of each, and was selected by him as his literary executor. He has written like a man full of his subject and forgetful of himself; and the result is a volume [vol. i.] appreciative, unaffected, and in entirely good taste. It is so faithful a delineation of a great intellect and a noble character that a thoughtful reader will seem to himself rather to recognize one whom he had known of old than to make acquaintance with him for the first time. . . . As one who was honoured by Hamilton's friendship, I may be permitted to bear witness that it is a faithful portrait of one who, of all the men whom I have met, appears to me to have most eminently combined depth and largeness of intellect with elevated aspirations and the simplicity of a child."—AUBREY DE VERE: Acad., xxiii. 179, 197.

"The hearty gratitude of all who can appreciate things lovely and of good report is due to Mr. Graves for this simple, discriminating, and sympathetic memoir of one who was in the best and noblest sense of the term a great man."—Spectator, lxii. 828.

Greely, Adolphus Washington, U.S.A., b. 1844, at Newburyport, Mass.; served through the civil war, and was brevetted major of volunteers in 1865. After the war he was connected with the signal service, and in 1881 was sent to the Arctic regions to establish one of a chain of thirteen circumpolar stations for scientific purposes, in accordance with a plan made by the Hamburg International Congress of 1879. On the return voyage in 1883 sixteen of the party perished of starvation, and the survivors were in an exhausted condition when rescued by a relief expedition. In 1887 he succeeded General Hazen as chief of the Signal Service Corps, with the rank of brigadier-general. 1. Three Years of Arctic Service: an Account of the Lady Franklin Bay Expedition of 1881–84 and the Attainment of the Farthest North. Illust. N. York, 1886, 2 vols. 8vo.

"The style of the narrative is excellent, easy, and unpretentious. The story of the 'Two Seasons at Fort Conger' is only second in interest, among recent Arctic voyages, to Payer's admirable 'Voyage of the Tegethoff.'"—Nation, xlii. 198.

"These volumes are . . . so full of valuable matter that it is difficult to make a selection of points for notice. No account of travel produced this winter is comparable with them; not one is so beautifully illustrated or treats of matters so important, and, though some of the maps have already appeared in Capt. Schley's 'Rescue,' they are, one and all, of pre-eminent excellence."—Ath, No. 3045.

The real value of this book is to be sought not in the charm of a brilliant style, or the surprising width of the knowledge it exhibits, or the vividness of the portraiture, or the subtlety with which some legal and constitutional questions are handled, but in the masterly manner in which the main object has been kept in view from first to last, and, though nothing in the history of his reign has been slurred over, everything has been subordinated to the setting forth the statesmanship of the king."—Ath., No. 3171.

Green, John Richard, M.A., LL.D., 1837–1883, b. at Oxford, Eng.; educated at Magdalen College School and at Jesus College, Oxford, and while an undergraduate published some papers in a local journal on Oxford in the eighteenth century. In 1860 he took his degree and was ordained. He became curate of St. Barnabas, King's Square, E.C., London, and was afterwards vicar of St. Philip's, Stepney. His health, always delicate, was seriously impaired by the labors of an East London parish, and particularly by his exertions during the cholera outbreak of 1867, and this fact, together with intellectual difficulties in regard to his position, led him to resign his parish for literary occupation. In 1868 he was made librarian to the Archbishop of Canterbury at Lambeth. For some years he wrote regularly for the Saturday Review, and contributed to other periodicals. His two latest works were written in the midst of a hopeless struggle with consumption. 1. A Short History of the English People: with Maps and Tables, Lon., 1874, p. 8vo. (Over thirty thousand copies were sold in the first year.)

"A single volume of the modest dimensions and unpretending appearance of a school-book; but the wealth of material, of learning, thought, and fancy which the author has lavished upon it might easily have supplied a stately library work of some eight or ten volumes. . . . Some previous knowledge, some time and attention, may be required rightly to appreciate the extent of Mr. Green's historical scholarship, or the depth and thoughtfulness of his comments on historical events; but the most indolent reader can hardly take it up without finding that he has lighted upon a book which is never commonplace and never dull. . . . If Mr. Green's style has a fault, it is the rather unusual one of excess of brilliancy. At times we are carried away with its passionate earnestness or fascinated by its poetry and tender feeling, but at other times we begin to wish for repose, and that the author would take things coolly. . . . The value of his book lies above all in the power it shows of conceiving a period as a whole, of tracing the causes and results of events, and of following the great currents of thought."—Sat. Rev., xxxix. 51.

"What he seems to profess, and what we think he makes good, is to have acquired all the newest knowledge upon a very large section of history, and to tell what he knows in such a style that every one may read it with little effort, and with such an arrangement, in many points new as well as ingenious, that it may be readily grasped and retained."—Ath., No. 2471.

"The secret of this extraordinary success it is not difficult to divine. Mr. Green's style is eminently readable and attractive. A lively imagination, not always under the most rigid control, imparts its own colours to the dry details of history, where a more scrupulous or conscientious writer would have wearied himself, and fatigued his readers, unwilling to venture beyond the arid region of facts. . . . If in some parts of his work we trace the conscientious study and examination of original authorities, in others he has trusted exclusively to secondary sources, attempting little more than a reproduction, after his own fashion, without exercising much independent judgment, and not always with rigid accuracy, of the opinions and conclusions of his predecessors."—J. S. Brewer: Quarterly Review, cxii. 285.

New edition, 130th–135th thousand, thoroughly revised, (by the author's widow,) 1888, cr. 8vo.

"Many interpolations have been made in Mr. Green's text without any mark to distinguish them from his own work, many of his statements of fact, and even some of the opinions he expressed, have been modified or completely altered, and several alterations have been made in arrangement. In almost every case the book has been improved by this revision."—Sat. Rev., lxv. 143.

2. (Ed.) History Primers, Lon., 1875–84, 6 vols. 16mo. 3. (Ed.) Literature Primers, Lon., 1875–79, 6 vols. 12mo. 4. Stray Studies from England and Italy, Lon., 1876, p. 8vo. 5. History of the English People: with Maps, Lon., 1877–80, 4 vols. 8vo. Vol. i., Early England, 449–1071; England under Foreign Kings, 1071–1214; The Charter, 1204–1291; The Parliament, 1307–1461. Vol. ii., The Monarchy, 1461–1540; The Reformation, 1540–1603. Vol. iii., Puritan England, 1603–1660; The Revolution, 1660–1688. Vol. iv., The Revolution, 1688–1760; Modern England, 1760–1815.

"Though the materials of the earlier book [the "Short History of the English People"] have been woven into it, and though we recognize many of the most brilliant passages as old friends, still the arrangement is so altered, and the amount of fresh matter is so large, that it is substantially a new work. . . . Almost the whole of the constitutional part has been rewritten in accordance with the views of Professor Stubbs. . . . Moreover, he has to some extent clipped the wings of his imagination, which in the earlier work sometimes took rather lofty flights In short, the new book, while retaining the life and sparkle of its predecessor, is better proportioned, calmer in tone, and altogether a more ripe and complete piece of work. . . . Mr. Green's belief in the rights of conscience is so strong that he can give due meed of admiration alike to the Protestant martyrs and confessors under Elizabeth; but it is at the same time neither with Protestant nor Romanist that his own sympathies lie. His heart is with the men who may be looked upon as the spiritual ancestors of the 'advanced thinkers' of our own day,—with the group of scholars of the 'New Learning,' among whom Colet, Erasmus, and More stand pre-eminent. . . . The care and pains with which Mr. Green has traced the various currents of religious thought can hardly be too highly praised. . . . Taking a general survey of the four volumes, we should be inclined to say that Mr. Green is at his best as an historian of mediæval times. . . . No man can be equally in sympathy with all centuries, and, on the whole, the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries form the period with which Mr. Green has least in common."—Sat. Rev., xliv. 44, 745, 813; xlv. 661; l. 214.

"Mr. Green has recovered the lost art of historical narration. This is his peculiar title to fame, and it is one which no contemporary English or American writer shares with him. . . . Impartial critics must, in estimating the causes of Mr. Green's success, add that he exhibits a boldness and originality in the judgment of historical characters which, if it increase the attractiveness of his work, is not always calculated to gain the confidence of cautious readers."—Nation, xxvii. 227.

Lon., 1881, 8vo.

"Though this book cannot be expected to be as popular as the 'Short History,'—for the average man is likely to shrink from a whole volume on what Canon Stubbs still permits him to call the Heptarchy,—we believe that students will rate it as high as, if not indeed higher than, any of Mr. Green's former works."—Sat. Rev., liii. 396.

"His present book is a piece of real original research. We do not say that it probes very deep into the fundamental question. As far as scholarship goes, it cannot compare with Mr. Elton's profoundly learned and broadly scientific work just published, which deals with much the same period; but looking at it as an essay written wholly within the narrow bounds of Mr. Freeman's Teutonic school, and based almost entirely upon the documentary evidence, it deserves high praise for its thoroughness and its general ability. . . . Indeed, two-thirds of the book may be accepted gratefully, without any reservation, by historians of every school, as a valuable contribution to the clearing up of perhaps the darkest period in our whole annals."—GRANT ALLEN: Acad., xxi. 111.

10. The Conquest of England: with Portrait and Maps, Lon., 1883, 8vo. (Left unfinished; edited by Mrs. Green.)

"It is difficult to criticise a book which we have no opportunity of judging as a whole. It follows as a matter of course that this volume cannot be placed upon the same level with 'The Making of England.' But we can see that there were materials here that might have made it as successful, and would probably have made it even more popular than the previous one. As it stands, it is necessarily open to criticism upon many points."—Sat. Rev., lvi. 803.

His influence as a teacher was very remarkable, owing both to the profundity of his speculations and the force and attractiveness of his character. He contributed philosophical articles to the North British Review and other periodicals, which are included in volumes published since his death. 1. 3. Prolegomena to Ethics. Edited by A. C. Bradley, M.A., Fellow of Balliol College, Oxford. Oxf., 1883, 8vo.

"The most able and remarkable contribution to ethical science which has appeared in our country since the publication of Professor Sidgwick's 'Methods of Ethics.' . . . It is the work of a mind of great power, although difficult to read in a measure far exceeding what is rendered necessary by the views of the writer and the subjects of which he treats."—Spectator, lvi. 1283, 1316.

"The simplicity and lucidity of the style are especially admirable when the complexity of much of the subject-matter is considered; the stream of argument is almost everywhere as clear as it is deep. From the entangled confusion, the Germanized jargon, the epigrammatic paradox, which render some metaphysical works insufferable, this treatise is entirely free. . . . No one interested in the analysis of the capacities of the human soul is likely to read this book without genuine intellectual delight."—Ernest Myers: Acad., xxiv. 205.

4. Works. Edited by R. L. Nettleship. Lon., 1886–88, 3 vols. 8vo. (Vols. i. and ii., Philosophical Works; vol. iii., Miscellanies and Memoir.)

"The 'Introductions to Hume' [1874] was the first work of the late Professor Green, and may be said to have summed up and expressed the results of his philosophical toil up to the time of their publication. The volume now before us [the second] contains the results of his later reflections on many philosophical topics."—Spectator, lix. 1418.

"It is enough to say of the whole book [vol. iii.] that it will be a treasure to those especially who knew him, because the Memoir fairly finds him out, and to those who have only heard of him from afar."—Sat. Rev., lxvii. 51.

"To Professor Green philosophy was not a study of the words of men that are gone, but a life transmitted from them to him,—a life expressing itself with that power and authority which belongs to one who speaks from his own experience, and never to 'the scribes,' who speak from tradition."—Prof. Caird: Preface to "Essays in Philosophical Criticism," edited by A. Seth and R. B. Haldane.

Greene, Francis Vinton, b. 1850, at Providence, R.I.; graduated at the U.S. Military Academy 1870; was military attaché to the U.S. legation at St. Petersburg 1877–79, and spent a year with the Russian army in the field. He was afterwards employed in public works at Washington, and in 1886 resigned his commission as captain in the U.S. army. 1. The Russian Army and its Campaigns in Turkey in 1877–1878, N. York, 1879, 8vo, with atlas.

"Of the four parts into which the work is . . . divided, the first . . . is a literal compilation (with brief résumés) from Russian official books on the recruiting, organization, armament, administration, and tactics of the army; the third, . . . a short sketch of the campaign in Armenia, based on no personal observation by the author; and the fourth, . . . on the defence and attack of fortified positions, interesting only to specialists; the second part, . . . on the campaign in Bulgaria, forms the main portion of the whole, the most valuable to the general public, as it is the most extensive and interesting."—Nation. xxix. 227.

"One of the most important contributions to military history which have appeared for many years. . . . The book, as Lieutenant Greene admits,—and as perhaps was only natural from the kind reception he received,—has a bias towards the Russian side, a stronger bias, indeed, than the writer is aware of; but the aim at impartiality is as clear as the spirit of accuracy and the painstaking ability which have been brought to bear on the compilation."—Sat. Rev., xlviii. 695, 733.

2. Sketches of Army Life in Russia, N. York, 1880, 12mo; new ed., 1885.

"His present work is in a measure supplementary to the previous one, but it is not less interesting, and scarcely less valuable. It gives sparkling sketches not merely of life in the army, as its title professes, but of the various orders of Russian society, from the Czar himself down to the humblest of his subjects."—*Sat. Interleaves in the Work-Day Prose of Twenty Years, [verse,] Lon., 1875, 12mo. 4. The Devil's Advocate, Lon., 1878, 2 vols. p. 8vo. (A satire against modern ideas and institutions, written in the form of dialogues.)

"The hero, if so we may call him, of these dialogues is a fastidious man of letters who, after writing as little as he could earn his bread by, has married a wife and retired on a competence. He thinks ill of the world, but appears to find much comfort in his own thoughts, which may seem an odd thing, but is quite true to nature, being the fundamental paradox of pessimism."—Sat. Rev., xlvi. 725.

"It is full of thought, and of thought which goes to the very kernel of most of the questions discussed. With a little more of terseness and dramatic force in his dialogue, and a little more of net result, even though it were only the net result deduced by a powerfully prepossessed mind, from the discussions, this book would have been not only thoughtful, but exceedingly likely to contribute greatly to form the convictions of an age to which conviction is greatly wanting."—Spectator, lii. 50.

"The state of Mars, as described in the record of Mr. Greg's imaginary adventurer, appears to show in a parable what mankind have to expect, or may plausibly be represented as having to expect, from the further progress of science."—Sat. Rev., xlix. 219.

"If we hesitate to pronounce the book a work of genius, it is because the subject-matter is so novel as to render difficult those comparisons on which literary judgments are usually founded."—Spectator, liii. 150.

7. Ivy: Cousin and Bride, Lon., 1881, 3 vols. p. 8vo. 8. Sanguelac, Lon., 1883, 3 vols. p. 8vo. (A story of the American civil war, the scene being laid chiefly in South Carolina, and the author's sympathies entirely on the side of the South.)

"Looked at as a contribution to the history of the American Civil War, 'Sanguelac' may be described as a challenge by Mr. Greg—to himself. . . . 'Sanguelac' proves only that he can write fiction which, from the literary and, above all, from the ethical point of view, is inferior to little and superior to most of the work of his contemporaries."—Spectator, lvi. 296.

9. Without God: Negative Science and Natural Ethics, Lon., 1883, 8vo.

"The range of 'Without God,' as its title indicates, is somewhat narrower than that of 'The Devil's Advocate.' . . . The subject proper is the ethical and theological developments and capacities of what is popularly called Agnosticism. The characters are much the same as in the former book."—Sat. Rev., lvi. 508.

10. The Verge of Night: a Novel, Lon., 1885, 3 vols. 11. History of the United States from the Foundation of Virginia to the Reconstruction of the Union, Lon., 1887, 2 vols. 8vo.

"Mr. Greg's history falls into three main divisions, or at least there are three successive portions of his subject which stand out conspicuously: (1) The early history of the New England Puritans; (2) the War of Independence, and (3) the War of Secession. On each of these matters he is an earnest partisan. Mr. Greg detests and condemns New England Puritans, American rebels, Northern abolitionists and their allies. . . . Every character, every incident, is so dealt with as to illustrate the righteousness of one cause, the unrighteousness of the other. . . . It is the more to be regretted that Mr. Greg should have chosen to write a partisan pamphlet instead of a history, because he has gifts which might have fitted him to play the better part. He sees his subject as a whole clearly and comprehensively; his style, though at times disfigured by rather vague rhetoric, is for the most part lucid and effective; his arrangement and grouping of incidents methodical; his narrative concise."—J. A. Doyle: Acad., xxxi. 267

"After half a volume of it, the reader who does not begin as a blind partisan finds himself sympathizing with the victims of all this scolding, even though he is naturally inclined to lean to Mr. Greg's own side . . . The statesmanship, the wisdom, the culture, the valour, the chivalry, the lofty refined courtesy of the South are insisted on till one longs for the suppression of these immaculate creatures."—Sat. Rev., lxiii. 421.

"It does not contain a particle of original research; it does not bring to light a single document, letter, note, or order. . . . Its animus is mischievous,—to arouse ill-feeling between America and England, and awaken resentments between the North and the South. . . . One would suppose that a novelist writing a history would at least make it entertaining; but there is not a picturesque description, a graphic narration, a fine personal characterization, in the two volumes."—Nation, xlvi. 140.

Greg, William Rathbone, [ante, vol. i., add.,] 1809–1881, b. in Manchester, where his family was largely connected with the cotton industry. He was educated under Dr. Lant Carpenter and at the University of Edinburgh; engaged in business, but was unsuccessful; was appointed a commissioner of customs in 1856, and controller of the Stationery Office in 1864. "Trade-Unions, Criminal Jurisprudence, Local Government, and Taxation are among the political problems of which Mr. Greg undertakes a partial or complete solution. Apparently cherishing no enthusiastic confidence in democratic principles, he endeavours to inquire how far it may be possible to make the best of an irrevocable change."—Sat. Rev., xxix. 318.

"This collection of essays, as Mr. Greg informs us in his preface, contains 'rather suggested thoughts that may fructify in other minds than distinct propositions which it is sought argumentatively to prove.' . . . After accompanying him through his opening chapters, we shall probably feel that our mental horizon has been widened, and we shall certainly feel that Mr. Greg has added fresh interest to his subject."—Sat. Rev., xxxiv. 602.

"Mr. Greg has never written a more eloquent book than this, and never any so full of deep religious feeling, in spite of its deep underlying doubt; but a good many of his readers will perhaps agree with us that he has added one to the deeper 'Enigmas of Life' by his discourses on them, rather than taken anything from their enigmatic character."—Spectator, xlv. 1627.

"We cannot too highly commend the courage, earnestness, and skill with which Mr. Greg has maintained a position which will be attacked on the one side by those theologians who practically regard the virtues of faith and hope as superfluities lacking a raison d'être, and, on the other side, by those men of science who think charity, in the large sense of the word, a delusion."—Ath., No. 2360.

10. Rocks Ahead; or, The Warnings of Cassandra, Lon., 1874, 8vo.

"The 'rocks ahead,' respecting which Mr. Greg desires to warn us, are three in number. The first is 'the political supremacy of the lower classes;' the second, 'the approaching industrial decline of England;' the third, 'the divorce of the intelligence of the country from its religion.' . . . In his excited imagination, the dangers that he descries assume unreal proportions; but some, if not all, of them are real dangers, and it is well that they should be pointed out."—Ath., No. 2448.

13. Miscellaneous Essays. Second Series. Lon., 1884, 8vo.

"The last words of a man of independent and vigorous judgment, who formed his opinions for no other man's pleasure, and was wholly indifferent whether what he said found favour with the great body of his hearers or with any party among them."—Sat. Rev., liii. 180.

"It was Greg's especial function to discourage unreasonable expectations from political or even social reforms, to impress his readers with the infinite complexity of modern problems, and in general to caution democracy against the abuse of its power. His apprehensions may sometimes appear visionary, and sometimes exaggerated, but are in general the previsions of a far-seeing man, acute in observing the tendencies of the age, though perhaps too ready to identify tendencies with accomplished facts."—*Dict. of Nat. Grego, Joseph. 1. Rowlandson the Caricaturist: a Selection from his Works: with Anecdotial Descriptions of his Famous Caricatures, and a Sketch of his Life, Times, and Contemporaries. Illust. Lon., 1880, 2 vols. 4to.

"Those who study English satirical prints of the last century are indebted to Mr. Grego for the share he took in the comprehensive monograph on James Gillray which appeared some years ago. Of this the two attractive volumes before us form the complement. . . . Of course a great deal of the letter-press is descriptive of, and supplementary to, the excellent photographic fac-similes of Rowlandson's drawings. . . . Much historical matter remained to be expounded, and it is in dealing with it that our author's industry has been most profitably exercised. At any rate, he has gathered for the world plenty of amusing materials."—Ath., No. 2752.

2. A History of Parliamentary Elections and Electioneering in the Old Days: showing the State of Political Parties and Party Warfare at the Hustings and in the House of Commons from the Stuarts to Queen Victoria: illustrated from the Original Political Squibs, Lampoons, Pictorial Satires, and Popular Caricatures of the Times, Lon., 1887, 8vo.

"A history not of facts pure and simple, but of popular opinion on matters political, as it showed itself in contemporary English satirical prints. . . . Extraordinarily interesting as Mr. Grego's book is, attractive and extremely amusing as are its hundreds of illustrations, we must not expect from them the truth, or all the truth, and nothing but the truth."—Ath., No. 3080.

"It is rather a collection of election caricatures, and anecdotes of striking incidents in some famous elections, than a connected history. . . . In spite of its somewhat irritating faults, the book is interesting and amusing."—Spectator, lx. 234.

Greville, Charles Cavendish Fulke, 1794–1865, eldest son of Charles and Lady Charlotte Greville, and grandson of the fifth Lord Warwick and of the third Duke of Portland; was educated at Eton, and at Christ Church, Oxford, where he took no degree, and from 1821 to 1860 was clerk of the Privy Council. Throughout that period he was in intimate relations with the leaders of both political parties, and saw much of the interior of court life. 1. The Precedence Question, Lon., 1840, 8vo. Anon. 2. "No equally important contribution to the political history of the last generation has been made by any previous writer. Perhaps the only passage in the published portion of the Memoirs which could at present cause any offence is a probably unfounded charge against a lady who is still alive of having had thick ankles in her youth."—*Sat. 4. The Greville Memoirs: a Journal of the Reign of Queen Victoria, from 1837 to 1852, Lon., 1885, 3 vols. 8vo.

"His sketches of character are sometimes almost worthy of St. Simon, whom he had probably studied with care, and they are the more valuable, though they may be less superficially consistent, because he often describes the same person more than once on varying occasions and in different moods of his own mind."—Sat. Rev., lx. 646.

"Readers who expect to find in the second instalment of 'The Greville Memoirs' . . . so many and such spicy bits of scandal as the previous three volumes contained will be disappointed. . . . It must be added that there is quite enough candid chronicling and sharp criticism in these volumes to make them amusing even to those who do not read them especially for the solid information they contain and the valuable side-lights they throw on the personal and general history of the time."—Ath., No. 3026.

5. The Greville Memoirs: a Journal of the Reign of Queen Victoria, 1852–60, 1887, 2 vols. 8vo.

"The completion of Mr. Greville's journals is a considerable literary event. From first to last they cover a period of forty years; and few English memoirs have been so copious, so exact, so well informed, or so incisive. In some respects this instalment lags behind the others. There are but few stories. . . . There are fewer portraits. . . . There is little scandal, and the pages are almost exclusively occupied with political events. . . . On the other hand, these volumes bring us within reach of our own times, and what they lose in piquancy they gain in personal interest. . . . This record is one of the most valuable and interesting political books of the century."—Acad., xxxi 69.

"He was peculiarly well informed on the most secret transactions of contemporary politics. He spared no pains in completing his information, recorded it with great freshness and perfect impartiality, and frequently revised his diaries. These characteristics, coupled with the brilliant portraits which he draws of his contemporaries, make his diaries the most important work of their kind of his generation."—*Dict. of Nat. Leaves from the Diary of Henry Greville. Edited by [his niece] the Viscountess Enfield. Lon., 1883, 8vo; Second Series, 1884, 8vo.

"If many of the extracts here given . . . are too brief and superficial to throw much fresh light on the subjects they refer to, there is an abundance of racy and instructive matter, showing pleasantly how a shrewd and amiable man, who had exceptional opportunities for observing social and political events, both at home and abroad, thirty or forty years ago, was impressed by what he saw."—Ath., No. 2900.

"The value and interest of Lord Grey's political writing is to be found in the fact that he treats contemporary politics like a wise and clear-sighted historian, not like a statesman who is confronted with the actual hard, practical problems of the world. . . . Lord Grey's final suggestion for the improvement of Ireland is, however, by no means so transcendental. He proposes to govern Ireland for a term of years like a Crown Colony."—Spectator, lxi. 273.

"After Mr. Herbert Spencer's philosophical admiration, Lord Coleridge's polished though rather undiscriminating panegyric, Mr. Arnold's cautious appreciation, and Mr. Irving's self-advertising praise, it was, perhaps, well that some student of the people and institutions of the United States should raise his voice in criticism and censure. . . . The voice of criticism, however, if it is to serve for guidance or warning, must proceed from accurate knowledge and impartial views. Of these two indispensable qualifications Sir Lepel Griffin possesses neither the one nor the other."—Spectator, lvii. 1640.

"By his title, 'Echoes,' Mr. Grindon explains that he does not mean resemblances, such as are the basis of popular nomenclature or scientific classification, . . but, as he expresses it, 'resonances from things of another substance,' the action of which he illustrates, in his own style, 'by the tree in the ancient forest calling to the blossom on the hills, and the fern in the dale calling to the weed on the beach.' These echoes or resonances he teaches us to apprehend in the general aspect and figure of plants, in their leaf, flower, bracts and calyces, stamens and pistils, fruit, seed, colour, and odours; . . . and under whichsoever of these heads we test his principles and research, we shall find equal ground for satisfaction."—*Sat. Captain Gronow's Last Recollections: being the Fourth Series of his Reminiscences and Anecdotes, Lon., 1866, 8vo. Posth. 5. The Reminiscences and Recollections of Captain Gronow: being Anecdotes of the Camp, Court, Clubs, and Society, 1810–1860: with Portrait, Four Wood-Cuts, and Twenty Etched and Aquatint Illustrations from Contemporary Sources, by Joseph Grego; each in duplicate, one on plate paper, remarque proofs, the other on Whatman paper, coloured by hand; limited ed., Lon., 1888. 2 vols. r. 8vo.

"Gronow was not exactly a Tallemant des Réaux, but he had many of the qualities possessed by that prince of anecdote, and there is no more delightful reading than the pages in which he restores the society of seventy years ago, or those in which we can read of the glories of the Second Empire and its Court."—Sat. Rev., lxvi. 622.

"When he relates his personal experiences, as in his accounts of the state of Paris in 1815, the condition of society in London in his own time, and the doings of the court of Napoleon III., his testimony is to be relied on, but his second-hand stories and anecdotes of persons whom he did not know are of little value."—*Dict. of Nat. Groome, Francis Hindes. 1. In Gypsy Tents, Edin., 1880, p. 8vo; 2d ed., 1881.

"Mr. Groome is exceptionally qualified to describe gypsies, having lived much among them and gained their confidence to a remarkable extent. His account of their manners and customs, therefore, is a valuable contribution to the materials on which the future historian must draw for a picture of their life and a summary of their opinions."—Ath., No. 2763.

The Towneley Hall MSS.: English Jacobite Ballads, Songs, and Satires, &c.: with Introduction, Notes, and Illustrations. (Printed for Private Circulation.) Manchester, 1877–78, 4to.

"The contents can only give the reader a poignant sense of disappointment. . . . The genuine poems of the Jacobites are cold and lifeless productions. . . . As an aid to the study of literature, life, and history, the MS. is most instructive, its special interest being that it relates to the England of Shakspere and Elizabeth."—Acad., xii. 378, xiii. 572.

"He has not given us any systematic exposition of the Platonic philosophy; he has not devoted even a single chapter to the general estimate of Plato's doctrines and a statement of their place in the history of thought. He has been content to follow the Protean philosopher through the mazes of each dialogue, sometimes translating long passages word for word, more often giving a sort of running analysis of the substance, and in both cases interspersing from time to time his own comments and criticisms. . . . Every one who opens his book can see that it is the work of a powerful mind which, having set before itself a high ideal of perfection, has thought no pains too great to be expended in carrying out his scheme."—*Sat. 4. The Personal Life of George Grote: compiled from Family Documents, Private Memoranda, and Original Letters to and from Various Friends, Lon., 1873, 8vo; 2d ed. same year.

"It is exceedingly readable,—more than readable, entertaining. . . . The contrast between Mr. Grote's quiet, simple, and scholarly letters, full of the work he was upon or the public events of the day, and Mrs. Grote's somewhat strong-minded personal sallies and badinage, has something of the effect of horseradish sauce with roast beef. We should like the book better with much less loudness of tone; but perhaps we might not read it with so much curiosity and amusement."—Spectator, xlvi. 638.

"Mrs. Grote's work is almost an autobiography of her husband, and probably he could not himself have composed it with equal fidelity and force."—Sat. Rev., xxxv. 785.

"The foot-journey through the heart of the Caucasus here recorded was undertaken in the summer of 1874 by four Englishmen, a Swiss guide, and an interpreter. . . . Few books of travel are thoroughly enjoyable except to those who have already some acquaintance with the regions described. Among these few 'The Frosty Caucasus' may, I think, be reckoned."—DOUGLAS W. FRESHFIELD: Acad., ix. 1.

An Ecclesiastical History of Scotland, from the Introduction of Christianity to the Present Time, Edin., 1861, 4 vols. 8vo.

"Mr. Grub is patient, laborious, accurate; more learned than Mr. Cunningham, as well as more careful and detailed. Of course he wants all the picturesque vigour, the genial spirit, the high-minded liberality, for which Mr. Cunningham is distinguished; but, as a book of reference merely, we know of few superior to Mr. Grub's."—Ath., No. 1821.

"The general plan of the work is judicious. The first part contains a commentary on the fragments which compose the title; the second part is a systematic exposition of the law of damage to property. But the execution is open to some objections. . . . All shows the work of a competent Roman lawyer."—H. J. ROBY: Acad., xxix. 373.

"A work of which British enterprise, British art and science, may well be proud, for all three have combined in the production of a book of travel in some respects almost unrivalled in the rich record of British exploration. Certainly the illustrations . . . have never been excelled, and seldom equalled, for accuracy and artistic finish, except in such classic works as those of the Bewicks and Gould. . . . The text of this delightful work—a joy alike to naturalist, traveller, and to the ordinary reader—is, generally speaking, quite worthy of its splendid embellishments."—A. H KEANE: Acad., xxxi. 51.

The Power of Sound, Lon., 1880, r. 8vo.

"With all his depth of thought and keenness of observation, the author adds little or nothing to what every musician of ordinary attainments must know as the result of his own experience. The problem of the effect of musical phenomena on the mind is not made lighter by the manner in which it is here approached."—Ath., No. 2813.

"The preface states that its chief object is 'to examine, in such a way as a person without special technical knowledge may follow, the general elements of musical structure and the nature, sources, and varieties of musical effect; and, by the light of that inquiry, to mark out clearly the position of music in relation to the faculties and feelings of the individual, to the other arts, and to society at large.' . . It is a book which disputants on every side will need attentively to ponder. Psychologically and æsthetically—and, we would add, physiologically also—it is a book which makes a distinct forward step."—Spectator, liii. 1658.

"It stands in truth without a rival in its class, not only for varied interest and philosophic breadth of view, but also for positive scientific insight into some, at least, of the aspects of music."—Dict. of Nat. Biog., xxiii. 357.

2. Tertium Quid: Chapters on Various Disputed Questions, Lon., 1887, 2 vols. p. 8vo.

"The essays collected in these volumes run over a considerable variety of topics,—moral, metaphysical, and æsthetic; but the most cursory examination will show that they are marked throughout by the same predominatingly critical and controversial character. Single-handed Mr. Edmund Gurney encounters one after another such champions as Mr. Frederic Harrison, the author of 'Natural Religion,' Mr. Mallock, Mr. Arthur Balfour, the late Prof. Clifford, Prof. Pollock, Mr. Swinburne, Mr. Alfred Austin, the opponents of 'psychical research,' both parties to the vivisection controversy, the devotees of Wagner, and finally, in defence of his own musical theory, Mr. James Sully and Prof. Stumpf. In each instance he shows perfect knowledge of the subject under discussion, perfect mastery of dialectical fence, perfect good temper and good taste. . . . He has worked out certain views on questions of the day which bring him alternately into conflict with both parties to the dispute. It is this attitude that the title of his book is meant to indicate."—ALFRED W. BENN: Acad., xxxiii. 73.

"Not only have the gentlemen who have collected this great stock of valuable data gone through a great deal of labour, and gone through it with a most praiseworthy determination to expose all the weak points of the evidence with which they were dealing, but we cannot too heartily praise the sobriety of judgment with which they have drawn their conclusions."—Spectator, lx. 146.

Guthrie, M.A. In Two Volumes. Lon., 1874–75, 2 vols. 8vo.

"Dr. Guthrie's Autobiography, brought by him down to the eve of the disruption of the Established Church of Scotland in 1843, is a thoroughly enjoyable composition. . . . It is the colloquial Guthrie with whom it makes us acquainted, the Guthrie of the fireside and the after-dinner circle, the cordial, sagacious, anecdotic, laughter-loving Guthrie."—Spectator, xlvii. 49.

"A most amusing piece of fooling."—Ath., No. 2855.

"It is a little too long for its rather fantastic kind of interest; the reader's sympathies are sometimes repelled when they ought to be attracted; and the fun is sometimes, though rarely, a little conventional. But it is certainly the best book of its own kind that has appeared for a long time; and in the way of provoking laughter by certain old-fashioned means, which do not involve satire or sarcasm, it has few rivals."—Acad., xxii. 44.

2. The Giant's Robe, Lon., 1884, cr. 8vo.

"A good tale of what might easily be real life. It is full of incident, and carries the reader on to the end with ever-increasing interest. There is some able character-drawing, too, and a little humour."—Spectator, lvii. 824.
